The Hon. Knute Nelson gave a rattling good Republican speech at Ericsson's Hall on Tuesday evening. He gave a brief review of both parties for the past thirty years, showed the hollow pretensions of the Bierman campaign and eulogized the administration of Gov. Hubbard showing him to be worthy and well qualified for the high responsibilities of the office to which he has once been elected. His speech was prolific with good, practical common sense and was listened to with marked attention by a large audience packed as full as the hall could entertain. Long before the speech commenced standing room was at a premium and hundreds went away, being unable to get within hearing distance of the speaker. This event shows our great need of a large hall in this city. Had this speech been given at the court house the room would not have been more than sufficiently large to contain the audience.

County News.

Fisher's Fancies.

From the Bulletin.

On Tuesday one of the planks of the bridge gave way and had to be renewed. Mr. Loveland attended to it and soon put it all right. He has also mended the road on this side of the bridge.

One night this week a prisoner in the calaboose was freed by some one outside breaking the lock. The jail-breaker is known, and in all probability will be caught and himself put somewhere to stay.

On October 24th Louis Peterson was married to Anna Johnson at the new church in Neby. The Rev. Mr. Saugstad officiated. Both bride and bridegroom are well known to us, and we are sure they will make a worthy and happy couple. We wish them every joy.

Hans Bangen had ten acres of wheat which produced 380 bushels of No. 1 hard, or on an average of thirty-eight bushels to the acre. He had, also, seventeen acres which went thirty-six and one-half bushels to the acre, and an old field that realized twenty-two bushels to the acre.

Last Saturday night or early Sunday morning, some one attempted to break into the Fisher Drug Store, next door to the post-office. The thieves managed to lift the bottom sash of Dr. Lankester's consulting room and enter the same, but their further progress was then barred by the inner door being fortunately locked. We would like the same gentry to pay us a visit while we are around.

Alvin Brainard came near losing his barn and six or seven horses the other day. The granary above had a great deal of grain in it, which proved too heavy for the joists, with a consequence that they began to give. Fortunately Mr. Brainard saw it coming, and was just in the nick of time to shore it up. Two of the joists broke however, before the job was finished. Had Mr Brainard not seen it the result would have been disastrous. Mr. E. Armstrong went out Monday to repair the damage.

THEY WERE LOADED FOR BEAR.

The Startling Experience of Two Polk County Grangers.

They Shoot a Bear Which Turns Out To Have Hoofs and Horns.

East Grand Forks Courier.

Quite a laughable incident took place in the town of Keystone one day last week, the recital of which created such a hearty laugh among the boys in the office that we are constrained to publish it. It appears that two farmers, brothers, named Hugh and Tom McDonald, living a few miles from town, having heard of the shooting near their place recently by the Aldrich brothers of a large black bear, and likewise of the fame of the deed, and eke the profit of the carcass, determined that the defunct bruin must have had a help-meat and probably some of his wife's relations in the neighborhood, and they accordingly laid low for the same. They loaded their shot-guns for bear, and nightly lay in ambush or skirmished around the points most likely to offer attractions for a bear with a well-developed appetite and properly regulated digestion. After having for some days braved the inclemency of the weather and the discomfort of the muddy season, their patience and vigilance were rewarded a few evenings ago by observing, stealthily prowling along the other side of an embankment thrown up by a ditching machine, a large black object, which they at once perceived by the awkwardness of its movements and other indications infallible to the practised bear-hunter, to be the object of their search. They at once cautiously but dexterously approached the animal on hands and knees, from the opposite side of the ditch, waiting a favorable opportunity to make the death of the animal a certainty. This was somewhat difficult, as bruin's back appeared and disappeared above the bank according to his uncertain and unconscious motions. Finally a favorable opportunity was offered, and as the fated animal appeared more in full view both brothers fired at once, pouring a deadly volley of buckshot into the doomed marauder. Uncertain however, of the result of their shot, and not knowing that the savage animal rendered desperate by its wounds, might not turn and rend them, they dropped their guns and made lively time for home, where they congratulated themselves upon their own safety, a winter's supply of beaf steaks and the glory of the skin and paws, which they determined to send into the city as proof of their achievements to say nothing of annointment enough to make their hair the envy of all the settlement for a twelvemonth. Early in the morning they started for the scene of the exploit armed with a tape-line to measure his length from the tip of his nose to the end of his tail, and other instruments for properly laying out the corpse of bruin. As they drove up to the scene of their achievement, in high anticipation, what was their amazement, not to say disgust, to find that the alleged bear wore hoofs and horns, and was nothing more nor less than one of their own prime yearling heifers. Slowly and sadly the carcass was lifted into the wagon, and no funeral could have been muter than the procession home. But the neighbors report that that afternoon, when they had nerved up to skin the unfortunate heifer and make the most of it, there were such sounds of dire profanity heard from the neighborhood of their claim as must have made Satan gleeful.

THE SAME OLD WAR CRY

The numerous Dakota friends of C. F. Kindred, who lately bought the immense tract of land in Arizona, are gratified to learn that he has struck a grand bonanza in the silver mines upon the land. If, as the engineer alleges, there is $1,500,000 of ore in sight, there can hardly be a limit to the extent of the deposit. If he will bring on a few barrels of it and knock the heads in, he may beat Knute Nelson for congress next year.—[St. Paul Globe.

The above extract from the St. Paul Glove is the frankest admission that Kindred did use money last fall, but intimates strongly that the only trouble was he did not use barrels enough. Hall says that if Kindred "will bring on a few barrels" he can beat Nelson next fall and Hall ought to know by this time the effect of Kindred's "barrel" upon himself, but he also should have learned enough about the effects of the barrel upon the honest voters of the Fifth District not to mis-judge them so harshly. Mr. Hall's idea seems to be that the only mistake of Mr. Kindred's campaign lay in not putting in enough money into it, that the aforesaid mineral lands will furnish plenty of "sinews" to carry Kindred to Congress. What a comment that would be upon the honesty of the voters if that was true!

Come neighbor of the Evening Journal, we are waiting anxiously for those Minneapolis figures on hard wheat!—[Duluth Tribune.

Well, you have got them, and although you have been chewing on them for some time you don't seem to find them very nutritious food—for Duluth. You can't argue down Minneapolis' superiority as a wheat market any more than you can argue the seal off a bond.—[Minneapolis Evening Journal.

And, Mr. Journal, you can't argue down the fact that Minneapolis owes what wheat she does get out of our hard-working farmers to a soulless, grasping monopoly; and you can't argue down the fact that Duluth pays the farmer an average of ten cents more per bushel for his wheat than does Minneapolis; and you can't argue down the fact that the farmers of the Northwest are working, watching and praying for a road to Duluth so that they may be delivered from the clutches of this giant monopoly that is every year stealing thousands of hard-earned dollars out of their pockets. Minneapolis has nothing to boast about in this wheat business. When she will consent to enter the field as a competitor in an open market, and pay a fair price for our wheat, then her boastings will strike us with better grace and she never will consent to that until a railroad from here to Duluth forces her to.

Our Chicago Letter.

CHICAGO, Oct. 31st, 1883.

The rain and mud and approaching winter are effecting a boom in the matrimonial market. It is such weather that makes the bachelor long for home comforts to offset the general dreariness of out-of-doors. And then a member of these chaps who have been hangers on of society for many seasons feel that their receptions in the parlors of mothers with marriageable daughters have become cool enough and they must move before they get the grand bounce.

In proportion as the male head of the household is active in business matters and accumulating wealth, so is his dame careful that their daughters waste no precious time or lovely smiles on the chronic beaux who "bore all the girls but hang marrying 'em. Of course there is more or less intrigue in these matrimonial affairs, the higher in social place the contracting parties the greater the probabilities of skillful managing.

"Wedding receptions" are no longer the proper caper, dinners and suppers taking their places in the upper circles of social life.

Feathers and brocade silk plush will be the leading features for walking costumes, and one cannot have too many feathers this winter. Large figures and loud colors predominate in dress goods.

From society to sausage is quite a transition, but while I think of it, I want to say a few words about the sausage industry in Chicago. The new arrival [illegible] ants signs bearing the simple but suggestive legend, "Free hot sausage." On a cold fall evening there is something comforting about these words; each "free" strikes the poor man, "hot" makes glad the cold man, and sausage satisfies all men. But we did not propose to deal with this luscious fruit at retail, but by the mile and by the ton. When between six and seven hundred persons in one city are engaged in turning out daily 200,000 pounds of sausage, our interest is aroused. There are machines of large size and complicated construction used to convert the useful pig into the succulent sausage link. There are about a hundred varieties of this article of food made to suit the various tastes of its consumers, and it is said that about 90 per cent. of the sausage made here is exported, and much of this returns from across the water as genuine German sausage. 'Tis thus we get ahead of Bismarck. He won't let our squeelers in on their hams so we make a chain of links and send them across.

FREIGHTS.

There is little doubt but the amount of freight handled by the railroads is the thermometer of business in this country, and just now the thermometer is very low. Freight shipments for the past week have been very light, the causes being attributed partly to the refusal of producers to sell at present prices and partly to high rates of transportation. The centrilazation of capital of leading roads enables the latter to demand what they please, as practically there is no competition. Lake freights are, and have been, firm with no indications of a break. There are charges that some of the roads are cutting rates, as what business there is seems to be unequally divided, and this will soon be followed by a break in rates. Business men generally complain of a dull season and cannot account for it in any way, for crops were fairly good and the Northwest, from which so much was expected, did not disappoint.

Chicago is having a slight moral agitation. The police here actually raided two notorious gambling dens in the heart of the city, destroyed the paraphrenalia and the courts punished the offenders. This is a form of vice which is doing more to injure the city, its youth and business men than anything else. It is true other vices have their share of representatives, but the gambler is making the most wrecks.

The mystery surrounding the murder of poor Zora Burns, at Lincoln, Ill., is still as dense as ever. The developments of to-day are that the Chicago chemist who has been examining the lines and horsewhip of the man Carpenter who is under arrest on suspicion, can find no traces of blood on them, and at a small town in Indiana a jeweler finds that recently a couple of strangers recently sold him among some other trinkets a gold ring on which was inscribed the dead girl's name.

St. Paul Globe: Last night about 9:30 o'clock as Henry W. Lewis, a traveling agent for Bradner, Smith & Co., was passing by the old high school building on Third Avenue south, he was confronted by three men who called upon him to surrender his money, one of them pointing a revolver at his head. They took from him about $175 in currency and $28 in checks, and missed $20 which he had in another pocket. No arrests are likely to follow, as he cannot describe the footpads.

Evening Journal: Mr. Robert Fairweather, of Euclid, Polk County, one of the leading Red River Valley farmers, arrived this morning from his farm having finished a seasons, is now on his way home to "Auld Scotland." He has engaged passage by the steamer Celtic to sail Thursday. Mr. Fairweather will return about the latter part of February.

Minneapolis Lumberman: Mr. T. B. Walker came down from Crookston on Tuesday and spent one day in the city. From a brief interview we are led to suspect he is wavering in his loyalty to Minneapolis, as he is enthusiastic concerning Crookston and the Red River Valley. Work on his new mill is progressing. He has fifteen million feet of logs laying in the Clearwater river and will cut nearly as much more this winter.

The Wheat Crop of Great Britain.

The Mark Lane Express gives the acreage in wheat in Great Britain the past season as 2,618,147 acres, with an average yield of 26.4 bushels per acre. This would give for the entire crop 68,987,280 bushels. About eight million bushels, it is estimated, will be required for seed, which would leave a little more than 60,000,000 bushels available for consumption. The annual consumption is stated at 200,000,000 bushels, showing a shortage of about 140,000,000 bushels, which will be needed to sup- [illegible] that not nearly all this quantity will have to be imported as the stock of wheat in the country is probably heavier than it has ever been before. If the yield in this country this year from our 37,000,000 acres had been equal per acre to that of Great Britain we should have had a crop of 992,640,000 bushels instead of the 415,000,000 bushels, at which the crop is now estimated by the Department of Agriculture. It is perhaps fortunate that we did not raise such a crop for it would have glutted the markets of the world, and yet it is a little difficult to see just how the American farmer is justified in growing wheat with an average yield in average seasons but little in excess of 12 bushels per acre while the British farmer gets 29½ bushels as an average crop of an average season.—[Farmers' Review.

Study Your Farm.

There is too much farming done at random. Failure frequently pursues a man through life for want of a clear and determined conception of the object that he ought to aim to accomplish. A forcible writer in the "Library of Useful Knowledge" urges every farmer to consider the nature of his farm; the quality, abundance, or the deficiency of his pasturage; the character of the soil; the year when he will have plenty or a deficiency of food, the locality of his farm; the market to which he has access, and the produce which can be disposed of there with the greatest profit. These things when well studied and decided will point him to the breed of stock he should raise, and the kind of grain or grasses he should cultivate. The man of more means and more ambitious aims may take in more extensive views, and look scientifically to the question of improvement of stock. But the farmer with limited means and less ambition, with whom we have most to do does not feel like running any risks, or engaging in the least doubtful enterprise. Such regard their cattle as a valuable part of their yearly income, and that source of revenue cannot be disturbed by interrupting the regular routine of business. And yet by careful study this necessary inflow can be kept up, and the income of his farm greatly increased without much enlarged expense, while the annual outlay otherwise now may be lessened, and labor lightened. Rich or poor, humble or ambitious, he ought to study closely what will best suit his farm, examining closely the points and qualities of his own cattle and those of his neighbors. If he determines dairying is the best for him he must examine the question of quantity and quality of milk, and its value for the production of butter and cheese; the time that the cows continue in milk; the character of the breed for gentleness, predisposition to disease, and the natural tendency to turn nutriment to milk; the ease with which she is fatted and value as a beef when she is given up as a milker; the proportion of food requisite to keep them in full milk or to fatten when dry. If grazing is decided to be the main business, then consider the kind of stock which the farm will be best suited for, the kind of meat most in demand at the greatest profit in his neighborhood, the early maturity, the quickness of fattening at any age the quality of the meat, the parts on which the flesh and fat are principally laid, and last of all, the hardihood and adaptation to the climate and soil. When a farmer wisely settles all of these questions, he will find he has but little time to loiter about neighboring street corners.—[Portland, (Oregon,) North-Western Farmer.

Peterson's Magazine for December is, as usual, ahead of all the lady's-books. Splendid as this magazine has been in the past, the present number quite outstrips itself. There are more than a hundred pages of reading matter; two superb steel plates; a colored pattern, costlier even than a chromo; a colored fashion, double size, printed from steel; and more than half a hundred wood cuts of fashions, work table patterns, etc., etc. The stories are, as always, exceptionally good: "Peterson" has long had the reputation of giving the best. It is a standing wonder to us how this magazine can be furnished at its low price; it can only be explained by the enormous circulation which "Peterson" has had now for more than thirty years. We really suppose there are few families, at all pretending to refinement, in which this magazine is not to be found. It claims, and not undeservedly to give more for the money—and of a better quality—than any other. The December number ends the year. Now, therefore, is the time to subscribe for 1884, or to get up clubs. We advise our fair readers to subscribe for no magazine till they have seen a copy of this. Specimens are sent gratis, if written for in good faith. The price is but two dollars a year to single subscribers. To clubs it is cheaper still, viz: Four copies for six dollars and a half, with an extra copy of the magazine as a premium to the person getting up the club. Or five copies for eight dollars, with both an extra copy of the magazine for getting up the club, and also a superbly illustrated book of the poets, called "The Golden Gift," or a large size steel engraving for framing "Heed Out" [illegible] other magazine gives such premiums. For larger clubs the price is still lower, while even more premiums are given. Address Peterson's Magazine, 306 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

TROUBLE AT LITTLE FALLS.

Citizens Indignant Over the action of the Northern Pacific.

Little Falls, Minn., Oct., 24th: A small sized railway war cloud has burst upon Little Falls, in the contest between the Northern Pacific road and the merchants of the place. It seems that A. J. Sawyer of Duluth, who controls the largest sized grain elevators, has secured the company's interest in his warehouse here and made early in the season an exclusive arrangement to contract all the grain shipped at this point through his elevator. J. H. Rhodes, an old dealer, when he was buying the season began to find himself shut out from the company's books and found the company had arranged to move only Mr. Swayer's grain, beginning back as far as Oct 5 h, demurred, and a red hot correspondence has been in progress between Mr. Rhodes and the general officers of the company. The crisis was reached two days ago in the flat refusal of the company, through both Freight Agent Haniford and Division Superintendent Odell to furnish Mr. Rhodes cars to move his grain. The refusal has created great excitement, as it was virtually an attempt to force the people to sell only to Mr. Sawyer's elevator. The language used by Haniford was that "Mr. Sawyer had large capital invested here and must be protected." This greatly inflamed Little Falls, and placards and bills brought the people together in a large meeting at the court house that evening. The evening was consumed in speeches, and a committee was appointed to draft resolution highly condemnatory, of the company's action. The acts of discrimination were condemned as revolutionary and destructive of popular rights. The resolutions were adopted with much spirit, and copies ordered sent with copies of the correspondence to President Villard, Gov. Hubbard and Railroad Commissioner Baker. Speeches were made pledging the business men to unite to prosecute the case to a just end, attorneys pledging their services free of expense. Money was also pledged to secure the best legal assistance.

Who Should Keep Bees.

We should say all farmers who have the conveniences should keep bees. The cost of obtaining a hive or two to start with is trivial and many persons unfit for hard labor by physical causes will make good bee keepers. Most of the farms have facilities for this purpose, for there is a sufficient range in the pastures, orchards, flowering plants and trees. It is demonstrated that there is more profit with the least labor bestowed in keeping bees than in any other branch or department of the farm. We suppose that mechanics residing in the villages could, with a little time and labor, supply their tables from their own storehouses. The merchant and professional man will find bee keeping a healthy and pleasant out-door pastime. They will find a free pasture for their bees.

Selling Farm Products.

The fall of the year is the season that farmers sell more of their products than they do at any other period, and, as is well known, the successful selling of a product depends largely upon the condition and appearance of the article when brought into the presence of the buyer, we wish to urge upon the husbandman the necessity of bestowing attention to the external appearances of every article offered for sale. We have found by experience that in purchasing butter or cheese we have always been tempted to pay a higher price for neat looking articles, even if the quality was not so good, than we would for those that did not look so nice, but yet of a better quality. It may be depended upon that the external appearance of articles has much to do with the price they bring in the market. We do not care what the products may be, the rule is the same; vegetables of all descriptions if outwardly fresh and clean make a favorable impression on the buyer; apples if in good, clean barrels, will bring more than if presented in old, dirty, greasy ones; and grain in neat, clean bags looks better and probably will bring more than if in shabby, dilapidated, patched-up sacks. Other things being equally neat, clean looking articles bring the highest prices. The value for poultry, for instance, is often diminished one-half by the untidy manner in which it is sent to market. Farmers will find that inattention to those little things frequently deprives them of the privilege of commanding the highest market prices for their products.

A Warm Bed for Pigs.

Every observant farmer knows that if his cattle are not sheltered from cold weather and storms they will require much more food to keep them in good condition than if they are retained in good warm stables. Just so with the swine, if they are suffered to run over the premises in the snow and sleet, with their bodies shivering with the cold and without a warm and dry bed of clean straw to resort to when they choose, they will not only come out with mange in the spring, but at every opportunity they have will convince their owners that all the food they have devoured has been thrown away; for shotes that have a cold, damp comfortless bed will be poor in flesh. It has been the opinion of some of our best northern farmers that in order to make a hog profitable he should not let him ever see the winter, and it is pretty well proven that unless they have warm quarters to winter in, spring pigs, well kept and nursed, are far less expensive and yield more in return than those which are 15 or 18 months old. But there is one thing certain, if we prefer to winter our [illegible] keep them both warm and dry through our long cold winters.

Oil Meal for Stock.

It is claimed that no description of food so greatly promotes the health of animals as oil cake, or oil meal, and it would be well for all farmers engaged in the dairy business, the raising and fattening of stock, or of wool growing, to give it a fair trial. We feel confident that they will find it of very great value. By those who have used it thoroughly, one pound is pronounced to be equal to two pounds of corn meal. For life-sustaining properties to all stock exposed to sudden changes of weather or over driving it has no equal. For milch cows it is particularly valuable, increasing the quantity of milk and improving its quality to a far greater extent than any other feed known. For beef cattle it has fattening properties which cannot be found in any other food, the beef always being more tender and juicy, and of a much finer quality than when fattened on any other feed; and no food known will so quickly prepare animals for market. For horses, a small quantity given daily promotes their health, and it is especially valuable for them when chilled or injured by overrunning. It is one of the best remedies known for horses subject to the heaves, and greatly increases the cleanliness, evenness and glossness of the hair. For sheep there is no article of food known that produces such fine mutton or so promotes the growth of wool. It should become in general use by the farmers.

Warm Stables.

We cannot too strongly urge upon our farmers the economy of warm stables in this climate. Besides the comfort to the stock it is a great saving in hay and other food. Cattle will not eat nearly so much fodder in a good warm stable as they will in a cold one. When wintered in a stable that is frost proof, with the usual allowance of feed, stock will come out in the spring in good condition. On the other hand, it matters not how much fodder and choice food may be given them if wintered out o a good warm shelter, for they are bound to come out in poor condition in the spring. A good man should be merciful to his beasts, and by keeping them in a good warm stable during our long winters he will have the satisfaction of knowing that his dumb brutes will be comfortable and and that he is making money by administering to their comfort.

MORTGAGE SALE.

DEFAULT HAVING BEEN MADE IN THE payment of the sum of seven hundred and thirty and 71-100 dollars, which is claimed to be due at the date of this notice upon a certain mortgage duly executed and delivered by John J. McLennan to M. R. Brown, bearing date the 28th day of July A. D., 1882, and with a power of sale therein contained, duly recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds, in and for the County of Polk, and State of Minnesota, on the 29th day of July A. D., 1882, at 4 o'clock p. m., in book "H" of mortgages, on page 170, and no action or proceeding having been instituted at law or otherwise to recover the debt secured by said mortgage or any part thereof.

Now, therefore, notice is hereby given that by virtue of the power of sale contained in said mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the premises described in and conveyed by said mortgage, viz: Commencing at the northwest corner of lot two (2.) in block twenty-six (26.) of the townsite of Crookston according to the recorded plat thereof on file in the office of the Register of Deeds in and for the County of Polk, and State of Minnesota, thence running in an easterly direction along the south line of Seventh Street a distance of one hundred and forty feet (140,) thence in a southerly course on a line parallel with the east line of Ash Street a distance of fifty (50) feet, thence in a westerly course on a line parallel with the south line of said Seventh Street a distance of one hundred and forty feet (140) to the east line of said Ash Street, thence in a northerly course along the east of Ash Street a distance of fifty (50) feet to the place of beginning, being fifty (50) feet by one hundred and forty (140) feet off of the north side of said lot (2) in said block twenty-six (26) of the townsite of Crookston as aforesaid, with the hereditaments and appurtenances which sale will be made by the sheriff of said Polk County, at the front door of the court house, in the city of Crookston, in said County and State on the 19th day of December A. D., 1883, at 10 o'clock a. m., of that day at public vendue to the highest bidder for cash to pay said debt and interest and the taxes if any on said premises and twenty-five dollars attorney's fees as stipulated by and in said mortgage in case of foreclosure, and the disbursements allowed by law; subject to redemption at any time within one year from the day of sale as provided by law.

LOCAL NEWS.

Everybody says this is lovely weather and for once everybody is right.

Frank Montague has so far recovered as to be able to be out on the streets a little.

Mr. W. O. Wilson, who has been very sick, appeared on the streets on Tuesday.

Mr. D. Buchaman rejoices in the arrival of a sister who has come for a visit.

Messrs. Lee & Herrick will send their first cargo of flour to Buffalo, N. Y., this week.

The young people will give a social dance in honor of Miss Hattie Sawyer on Friday evening next at Ericsson's Hall.

The Congregational church was not got in readiness for services on Sunday last but will be ready for services on Sunday next.

Hinman's opening dance was a big success, well attended and the universal verdict was that Hinman knows how to keep hotel.

Wm. Olsen, a brakesman on the line, had his fingers pinched by the bumpers, at Edna last week. Dr. Dampier patched him up in good shape.

Mr. W. H. McCulough has sold his residence on Houston Avenue to P. A. Dufour and is making preparations to go to Washington Territory about Nov. 15th.

Mrs. I. U. Jennings has just received a large stock of New Millinery Goods consisting of Hats, Feathers, Plumes, Plushes, Satins, Ribbons, Etc., all of the latest patterns and designs. [28-tf]

An item in the Grand Forks Plaindealor of last week, gave the idea that Grand Forks had secured our band leader and that Crookston had lost him. Interviewing him on the subject he says it is all a mistake—he is merely giving the Grand Forks band lessons. This shows that Grand Forks can appreciate a good thing when she sees it.

The town of Fairfax cast twelve votes six for Hubbard and six for Bierman. That town should have cast eighty votes and given a big majority for Hubbard. As it was Bierman polled his full strength while 68 Hubbard men stayed at home to plow. We reckon that is about the way the whole county vote will pan out.

A fine Store building underneath the U. S. Land Office on Broadway now being completed. It will be ready for occupancy about Sept. 15th. For terms and particulars apply at the U. S. Land Office, Broadway Crookston Minn. SLETTEN & CROMB. [6-tf]

Tom Ratchford is pushing work upon the Red Lake River Boom and Water Power Company's works, on the Phil Perger place. He is improving this lovely weather to the utmost and will make a big showing before the freezing up. The company will clear up the slough this winter and have everything in readiness to commence work in earnest in the spring.

The Democrats got up a little demonstration on Monday night by way of invoking a little courage for the coming struggle of Tuesday. R. J. Montague addressed a large audience of Republicans and Biermen in Ericsson's Hall and then, the Democratic speaking timber having given out Judge R. Reynolds was called out who gave the Democratic party such a raking fore and aft as must have been decidedly uncomfortable for the few Democrats who were in the hall; and the Judge did not get in the least excited over it either.

The returns from 33 towns of this chounty show the status of the vote for Governor, as follows:

Hubbard	887
Biermann	681
Hubbard's majority	206

There are over twenty towns yet to hear from which will probably give an aggregate majority for Hubbard of about 100, which will make Hubbard's majority foot up to about 300.

From the returns thus far made we are of the opinion that Chas. Kretzschmar is elected County Commissioner in the 4th District and Timothy Sullivan for the 5th District. Messrs. Columbus and Carruth appear to have been elected by handsome majorities.

County News.

St. Hilaire Racket.

From the Spectator.

Mr. Theo. Thibeault has closed up his saloon.

A special train arrived in town today with some of the railway officials who were up looking over the improvements being made here.

The threshers are now grinding out the No. 1 hard in the Thief River country and the reports of 35 bushels to the acre will soon be coming in from that direction.

Saw Mill.

Darling & Sorsoliel have been busily engaged during the past few weeks in getting their saw mill in readiness to commence operations. Their big 42 horsepower engine has been put into place, the mill has been built, the big circular saw stands ready to be put in motion and they will commence to-day converting into lumber, the large quantity of oak and pine logs which the purchased from the Indians last summer.

Sheriff Zwickey, of Crookston seems to have fallen in love with St. Hilaire. He was up again last evening shaking hands with his many friends here. We are always glad to see you, Sheriff, that is, when you are not armed with an official document of some kind. We are not partial to official documents in the hands of a sheriff.

After the Pine.

Thos. Corkran, of Minneapolis, and Wm. Richie and Gorge Dickson, of Eau Claire, Wis., passed through here on monday last on their way to Red Lake to examine the quality and quantity of the pine. They are in the employ of large mill men and say that there is no doubt but what the Red Lake reservation will be thrown open for settlement this fall.

THE SUN.

NEW YORK, 1884.

About sixty million copies of THE SUN have gone out of our establishment during the past twelve months.

If you were to paste end to end all the columns of all THE SUNS printed and sold last year you would get a continuous strip of interesting information, common sense, wisdom, sound doctrine and sane wit long enough to reach from Printing House Square to the top of Mount Copernicus in the moon, then back to Printing House square, and then three-quarters of the way back to the moon again.

But The Sun is written for the inhabitants of the earth; this same strip of intelligence would girdle the globe twenty-seven or twenty-eight times.

If every buyer of a copy of The Sun during the past year has spent only one hour over it, and if his wife or his grandfather has spent another hour, this newspaper in 1883 has afforded the human race thirteen thousand years of steady reading, night and day.

It is only by little calculations like these that you can form any idea of the most popular of American newspapers, or of its influence on the opinions and actions of American men and women.

The Sun is, and will continue to be, a newspaper which tells the truth without fear of consequences, which gets at the facts no matter how much the process costs, which presents the news of all the world without waste of words and in the most readable shape, which is working with all its heart for the cause of honest government, and which therefore believes that the Republican party must go, and must go in this coming year of our Lord, 1884.

If you know The Sun, you like it already, and you will read it with accustomed diligence and profit during what is sure to be the most interesting year in its history. If you do not yet know The Sun, it is high time to get into the sunshine.

TERMS TO MAIL SUBSCRIBERS.

The several editions of The Sun are sent by mail, postpaid, as follows:

DAILY—50 cents a month, $6 a year; with Sunday edition, $7.

SUNDAY—Eight pages. This edition furnishes the current news of the world, special articles of exceptional interest to everybody, and literary reviews of new books of the highest merit. $1 a year.

WEEKLY—$1 a year. Eight pages of the best matter of the daily issues; An Agricultural Department of unequalled value, special market reports, and literary, scientific and domestic intelligence make The Weekly Sun the newspaper for the farmer's household. To clubs of ten with $10, an extra copy free.

OCTOBER.

Gay October, mad October!
Dancing 'midst the falling leaves,
Singing 'round the heaped-up sheaves,
Laughing, laughing, never sober—
Comes no thought of sadness o'er thee
For the bright days gone before thee,
For the dark ones coming after?

Soon thy brief, glad reign is ended;
Scarce thy face shall we remember,
When the gloom of drear November
On our spirits has descended.
Therefore change thy smiles to sighing,
Stay thy nimble footsteps flying,
Cease thy airy, thrilling laughter!

B. A. Goodridge.

MISS LIRRIPIP'S LOVERS.

Miss Lirripip had a pretty face and $5,000 a year, not to speak of expectations. Pretty faces are common enough, even in these days of agricultural depression and stagnant trade; but a girl with $5,000 a year is a rarity; and a girl with $5,000 a year and a pretty face into the bargain is a positive phenomenon; and, as such, cannot fail to be greatly admired by a number of more or less eligible young men with a taste for beauty of the most substantial kind. Even middle-aged bachelors awoke from their habitual indifference when, on being introduced to a lovely damsel of two-and-twenty, they are conscious that the possessor of a considerable fortune stands before them; for, although money is the root of all evil, it is a root which most people very willingly undertake the risk of cultivating.

Since Lydia Lirripip was thus beautiful and thus rich, it is not surprising that she had not only admirers—men who dared to wish uncertain things; but lovers, too—men who had the presumption to hope. It is true that Lydia encouraged none of them, for she was quite satisfied to live at home with her father, Gen. Lirripip, in Bruton street, Grosvenor square, and to ride in Rotten Row in the morning, and to drive in the park in the afternoon. But, fortunately, young men do not require the encouragement; nay, in certain affairs the less encouragement they receive the greater their persistency becomes; and considering that healthily constituted young women seldom, if ever, give any encouragement to young men, the persistency of these latter in the face of alarming difficulties is a matter on which all of us may heartily congratulate ourselves. Indeed, but for the persistency who knows whether the world would go round?

It was the height of the London season, and Lydia Lirripip went with her father one evening to a great ball at the countess of Carnaby's. Everybody was there—everybody, that is, of rank and fashion—and ere she had been in the brightly lighted rooms for five minutes Lydia was engaged for all the dances on the programme. Now, to most of her partners she was only engaged for a single valse or polka, but, for old acquaintance's sake, or for some other reason, she allowed three gentlemen to take two dances each. It was, no doubt, very indiscreet of her to do so. But in one case at least it was also very good natured of her, for she permitted old Sir Pertinax Popinjay, who, as every one knew, was far too stiff and gouty to move about properly, to put down his name for the only two sets of lancers. Sir Pertinax was effusively grateful, and smiled his sweetest upon her as he returned her programme, and Lydia, instead of regretting her kindness, felt thoroughly rewarded by seeing that she was giving pleasure to the gray-haired baronet, who, thirty years before, had been a noted dandy, but who now struck her as being simply a prosy old fellow, whom very few girls would be likely to dance with. Lydia's other favored partners were Mr. Horace Freake—a young artist who had that year for the first time exhibited at the Royal academy—and Mr. Merton Murley, a man who had no profession and no occupation, and who, if he had a private income, derived it from a source not generally known even to his friends.

In this world many strange coincidences happen. Two chemists have been known to make exactly the same discovery on the same day; and two astronomers have claimed to catch sight of a new comet at almost the same moment. It is not, therefore, incredible that, while dancing these six dances with her three favored partners, Lydia casually mentioned to each of them that upon the following evening her father was going to take the chair at the annual meeting of the Society for the Encouragement of Cold Water Bathing on the Continent; that she was not going, but would be alone at home; that she wished that girls were able like men to amuse themselves; and that she envied her partners their clubs, their theaters and their sociable smoking concerts. Nor is it incredible that, having heard this, Sir Pertinax Popinjay, Mr. Horace Freake, and Mr. Merton Murley all made up their minds to call upon Miss Lirripip upon the following evening, and to make to her certain avowals, which, although they had long meditated them, they now felt impelled to make as soon as possible, and without any unnecessary delay. What these avowals were may be guessed; but why the three gentlemen all determined at the same time to make them is a question which cannot be explained, although the fact that Lydia that evening looked even prettier than usual may possibly have been one of the causes of the extraordinary coincidence.

Lydia little dreamed, when in the small hours of the morning she dropped off to sleep, of what was hanging over her. Sir Pertinax had made no sign; Mr. Murley had not been more attentive than had for some time been his wont; and Mr. Freake had been actually more dull and uninteresting than Miss Lirripip had ever seen him. She therefore slept soundly, and was undisturbed by fears of the coming evening and its visitors.

The following day was wet. The general, who had lived for many years in India, and had a liver which caused him to be somewhat irascible, shut himself up in his library and savagely studied the statistics of cold water bathing; and Lydia, who could not go out, painted in her boudoir. The Lirripips dined at half past five to enable the general to get to the meeting at half past seven; and as he had taken no exercise during the day, and had been quite unable to master all the information he required relative to the average of cleanliness upon the continent. Lydia's father was not in the best of tempers. "Sit up for me," he said; "I shall be in by 11:30." These were his last words, as, the carriage having been announced, he hurried away from the table, stopping for an instant at Lydia's side to kiss her hastily on the top of the head. And Miss Lirripip was left alone in solitary grandeur, sitting at one end of the dining room. She did not stay there long, but went to the drawing room, whither she bade a servant bring two candles, which but dimly lighted the large apartment. Then, taking her seat at the piano, Lydia began to play and to sing alternately.

The drawing-room at Bruton street was like many other London drawing-rooms. It occupied the whole of the first floor of the house, save where in one corner the staircase ascended; and it was therefore L-shaped, the longer arm of the L having three windows looking out into the street, and the shorter arm one window looking out over some mews in the rear. Heavy curtains of tapestry hung between the back and front portions of the room, but were usually looped up; and in the back room was the piano, at which, within the halo of the two candles, Lydia Lirripip played and sang.

She had considerable knowledge of music and a fine voice, and, wrapped up in her occupation, she started when the door of the front room opened and a servant, who was to her invisible, announced Mr. Horace Freake.

Lydia rose and received her visitor, meantime ordering the gas to be lighted. It was 8:30. Why had he called at that hour? Why had he not come in the daytime, while she was so dull, rather than just when she was singing? But, upon the whole, she was glad to see Horace, who, no doubt, simply desired to inquire how she was after the dance of the previous evening, and had not been able to do so earlier. As he betrayed, nevertheless, a certain hesitation in his manner, she led the conversation, and asked him whether he had enjoyed Lady Carnaby's ball. He had, he said, pretty well; and then ensued a pause, during which Horace rather awkwardly took a seat at Lydia's side on an ottoman and gazed at the carpet. Mr. Freake was not altogether stupid, but even wits often become rather dull when they are meditating an immediate proposal; and the situation is so trying to almost every man who finds himself in it, that it amply excuses the exhibition of a little uneasiness and nervousness. Mr. Freake certainly was nervous, but he soon recovered himself.

"Your father is at the meeting, I suppose. Don't you feel it very dull all by yourself here, Miss Lirripip?"

"Oh, no. I have been singing; and all day I have been painting."

"But dull—I mean without society? I know that I do, and I have much more society, I suspect, than you have. Unless I go out, the evenings, I find, pass very slowly. I cannot get the excitement of work, for, of course, one can't paint by artificial light; and if I try to read I generally go to sleep over my book."

"I think that you must be difficult to please, Mr. Freake. You have a lovely studio, and you ought always to be able to amuse yourself among such beautiful things as you have in your house."

"No! I don't think that I am difficult to please, Miss Lirripip, for I know exactly what I want. The fact is that a bachelor's existence is not suited for a man of my feelings and sympathies. I live wrapped up in my selfishness, and feel my heart growing colder and colder every day. I have beautiful things in my house, but they don't satisfy me. I want living beauty—something which I may really care for and do for—something which shall make my life complete. And it was to talk to you about this, Miss Lirripip, that I came to see you this evening."

Lydia experienced a curious sensation which she had never felt before.

"You know, I suppose, Miss Lirripip," he continued, "what I mean. You know that since I first saw you, three or four years ago, I have loved you." And Horace took Lydia's unwilling hand. "Can you," he went on, "learn to love me? Will you be my—"

Ratatatatatatat! There was a knock at the front door, and Lydia was greatly relieved.

"Is somebody coming up?" asked Horace, anxiously. "Oh, I so much want to tell you all. Say you are not in. Send them away. But let me stay. Promise to let me stay."

A voice, evidently Mr. Merton Murley's, was now audible from below, the drawing-room windows being open and the voice being loud.

"It is Mr. Murley," said Lydia. "I expect that he only wants me to give some message for him to my father. He will not detain me. But if I let you stay, you must not talk any more as you have been talking, Mr. Freake."

At this moment there were footsteps on the staircase, and Horace, without another word, fled incontinently into the back drawing-room and rapidly drew the curtains behind him so as to conceal himself from the new-comer, who immediately afterward was announced.

Mr. Murley was not so nervous as Mr. Freake had been upon his first appearance. He shook hands with Lydia in an easy and light-hearted manner, paid her an airy compliment, seated himself comfortably opposite her, and, without many preliminaries, revealed the object of his visit. "I know that your father is out, Miss Lirripip," he said, "and I may as well confess at once that I have deliberately taken advantage of his absence to come and see you upon a subject which nearly concerns my happiness. I should have spoken about it last night but that I could not command your attention save for a few minutes at a time. Now, however, we are safe from interruption."

"But, Mr. Murley," said Lydia, "it would be so much better if you would call when my father is in."

"Oh, that is not important, my dear Miss Lirripip. It is a subject that may be settled by you alone."

"Please, Mr. Murley, do not tell me about it now," pleaded Lydia. "The windows are open, you know, and there are servants about the house, and—"

Ratatatatatatatat!

This time Horace, as well as Lydia, was greatly relieved; but Mr. Murley was furious. "Let me see you to-morrow," he said, hastily.

"Yes! no! no!" returned Miss Lirripip, thankful for any opportunity of getting rid of him. "Good-bye, Mr. Murley; good-bye!" And the same servant who showed up Sir Pertinax Popinjay showed down Mr. Merton Murley, who glared at the baronet with a look which spoke volumes.

"My dear Lydia," said Sir Pertinax, as he offered both his hands to Miss Lirripip, "you were really charming last night. I never saw such a perfect sylph in my life, and many people agree with me. You were the belle of the room; there is no doubt about it."

"I'm sure it is very good of you, Sir Pertinax, to say so," returned Lydia; "but I thought that the countess herself—"

"Oh, the countess! She and you cannot be mentioned together, my dear. Every one said so. And besides the countess of course is married. She has met her fate. Ha, ha! But you—you are still—my dear Miss Lydia, I may be a fool; but, upon my honor, I have come here this evening with the determined intention of asking you whether you will have me. You know I worship the very ground you stand on." And to Lydia's great consternation the old gentleman, ere she could prevent him, gallantly knelt at her feet and took her hand with the evident intention of pressing it to his lips.

"Do get up, please, Sir Pertinax," said Miss Lirripip, forgetting for a moment that Horace Freake was within hearing, but anxious that the baronet should not make himself unnecessarily ridiculous even to her. "You can talk just as well if you sit down; but really you mustn't talk in that way. I don't want to be married; indeed, I don't. You know I like you very much, but I could not possibly marry you."

Sir Pertinax rose with dignity and looked rather disappointed. "I had hoped, Lydia, that you liked me well enough even for a husband. What you say, however, may not be final, because nothing can alter my regard for you, and perhaps in the future you may think better of me."

"I could not think better of you than I do," returned Miss Lirripip feelingly, "and you do not know how sorry I am that this has happened. We can never again be the same to each other. I am so sorry."

Sir Pertinax began to feel sorry too, for, up to that evening, he and Lydia had always been like uncle and niece, and, in an uneasy way, he turned the conversation into another channel. But he could not for long carry it on, and in less than a quarter of an hour he said good-bye, like a sensible man as he was in spite of his weakness, and departed.

No sooner had he quitted the room than Horace emerged from his hiding-place. Lydia blushed to remember all that he had overheard; but he did not allude to it. "Lydia," he continued, almost as if nothing had happened to disturb him, "I love you truly, and with all my heart. Will you, can you, learn to love me, for your love alone will make me completely happy?"

"Do not ask me," replied Lydia, who was once more seated. "You know what I have just gone through. My head is in a whirl."

"But think how happy you can make me, Lydia! You would be everything to me, as indeed you are already, and I would spend all my days in making you happy."

It is unnecessary to chronicle the whole of the further conversation that took place. Suffice it to say that at last Miss Lirripip discovered not only that she could, but that she actually did, love Horace Freake a little, and on the strength of that she promised to marry him.

Horace was in the act of presuming upon this promise by kissing Lydia for the first time, and was enjoying one of the happiest moments of his life, when another of those furious ratatatats shook the house.

"Another!" said Mr. Freake with a smile. "I shall go back to my retreat until we know who has arrived, for now I must be on the spot to look after you." And in spite of Lydia's protestations, he once more retired to the back drawing-room.

Two minutes afterward, the general, very hot and very angry, stamped up stairs and burst into the presence of his daughter. "Everything has gone wrong!" he exclaimed. "They voted me out of the chair; they flew in my face; they decided that the wretched foreigners don't want cold baths." And he pounded with his stick, which he had brought up with him, and looked at Lydia, as though she were the cause of his discomfiture.

"Well, papa," said Miss Lirripip, soothingly, "all the better. Now you wont have to go to any more of their horrid meetings."

At this juncture, Horace, who was troubled with a slight cold, gave forth a stifled and infinitesimally small sneeze.

"Lydia," cried the general, as he threw himself wearily into an arm chair, "I'm sure there's a cat in the back drawing-room. Go and turn it out." And Miss Lirripip, having no alternative, went cautiously behind the heavy curtains, and was there received in her lover's arms.

"You cannot speak to him to-night," she whispered. "He would not listen to you. You see, how cross he is. Come again to-morrow."

Horace, therefore, silently took another kiss; and Lydia, having unlocked the little-used door of the back room, chased him, with many expressions of animosity, down the softly-carpeted staircase, and with a cry of "Shoo, cat!" finally let him out of the front door.

When she returned to the drawing-room, Gen. Lirripip gave vent to some angry expressions of hostility toward the entire feline tribe, and when he had thus delivered himself went off to bed.

How the story ended may be easily guessed. When Lydia's father was in a cooler mood, Horace found no difficulty in obtaining his consent to the marriage, which took place three months afterwards; and to the end of their days, neither Sir Pertinax Popinjay nor Mr. Merton Murley had any idea that a third person was present when they proposed to Miss Lirripip in Bruton street, Grosvenor square.

LOVE, THE SIREN.

"With slender, taper fingers fine,
And shell-like nails, half-opaline,
She lifted up her wondrous wealth of hair,
And from beneath their sunlit maze
Of threaded gold, with silent gaze
Looked out her sad, pathetic eyes,—
Deep homes of peace and patient prayer,
Where feeling made its lonely lair,
And silences beyond surprise.

"Her lips were ripened fruit, where bliss
Might long to die upon a kiss,
By feeling stung to perfectness;
The languor of a passion past;
Too perfect at its height to last,
The sweet and half-exhausted sense
Of being almost too intense,
Beneath whose exquisite excess
Life fainting falls in weariness
And droops to sad indifference.
All this had made her wan cheeks thin,
And Love's lost purpose lived alone
Upon the proud projected throne
Of her compelling chin.

"A drowsy poppy flower was she,
Whose slender stem was overborne
By faint, voluptuous ecstacy,
That had outweighed its wearied head
And all its strength outworn;

"And languid, longing, and forlorn,
Like one to dreaming fancies wed,
To whom all real things were dead,
She gazed forth right into the air,
And in her slender hand and rare
Bore a pomegranate red.

"And on the sward were gathered near
A-dream along the slope,
Full many a knight and cavalier
Who had abandoned Hope.
No strength was theirs—down they had laid
Their sword and spear—with pensive head
And dreary eyes where joy was dead,
Silent to gaze on her.
For them Life had no other scope—
The flash and gleam and battle stir,
The clank of steel, the sword's swift whir,
And manhood's strength and stress
For them was gone—they knew alone
Life's utter weariness.

"'Dear Dove—sweet Love,' they sang—'things only seem.
Let the world go while here we lie and dream.
What matters it though all the rest be gone
If Love is left, for life to gaze upon?'"

WHAT WOMEN WANT TO KNOW.

Baltimore Styles in Stockings.

A Baltimore Sun reporter has discovered what the latest thing in stockings is by asking a salesman: "The styles this year are—I was going to say they are just too lovely for anything, but you newspaper men make so much fun of that expression I guess I won't use it. But, indeed, the new styles are lovely. They are in such exquisite shades. Will I show you some? Certainly. This is the latest shade. It is called the electric blue. Everything's electric blue this winter. Too pale? Yes. I think so, too. Now, here is some of the newest heavy-ribbed goods. Did you ever see anything so neat, and so pretty, and so rich? They come in all shades, but are of a solid color. Here's a silver lavender, and here's a turquois, and here's a Russian blue, and here's a jet black, and here's an orange, and—oh! just look—here's the ashes of rose! Isn't it perfectly beautiful! In my opinion the ashes of rose—but I beg pardon, what did you say? Can we tell by the size of the foot whether the stocking will fit the ankle? Oh, yes; you see—but won't you please excuse me? Here comes one of my customers. I'll send our buyer to you. He knows a great deal more about hosiery than I do. Indeed he does."

"There's no trouble about the fit," said the buyer. "Fine silk is very elastic. It will give either in breadth or length. If it is too broad, it will come to the right size by pulling it up higher. See how this stocking stretches? It will fit the leg like a kid glove fits the hand. The sizes range from eight to ten. In Baltimore the average is from eight to eight and a half. In Boston and Chicago it is from nine to nine and a half, and in New York from eight and a half to nine. It is a well known fact among hosiery dealers that the women of Baltimore have the smallest feet in the country. Why, there is not a day passes without some lady asking for seven and a half, which is a girl's size. I said 'asking,' but that was a slip of the tongue. They don't ask for any particular size. Nor do we ever guess at the size. We show them the different shades, and they make their selections apparently without noticing the size. There are, of course, exceptions to this rule, but why most of the women of Baltimore should be so diplomatic about buying stockings is something I can't see any reason for. If I were in Boston or Chicago or St. Louis I could readily understand the object.

"Yes, there are lots of high-priced stockings sold in Baltimore. Here's a pair worth $15. This style is known as the czarina. Each stocking is made in parts and then woven together, after the manner of an India shawl. There are four or five distinct colors in this design. The czarina, the sandal fronts, and other freaks of fancy designing, are worn in the evening and at parties. Black stockings are worn at all times and are very popular. The foot and ankle look smaller in black than any other color."

Brunettes.

Although almost everybody knows what is requisite to be a true brunette, there are still a few who are not even yet educated up to it, and who call a woman who has a dark clear skin, "cheeks like roses and lips like the cherry," hair purplish black, and dark grey eyes, a brunette. No woman is a true brunette who has not very brown or very black eyes. What is known as the "Irish type" of beauty is one of the loveliest. No eye is so blue, so large, so expressive, or so heavily fringed as that of the possessor of this type; no hair is so glossy and dark and heavy; no complexion so rosy and healthful, and to people in general this type is the most bewitching and fascinating. A type of beauty that has had its day, but of which we see representatives occasionally, is what is known as the "strawberry blondes." Brick-red hair, blue eyes and fair, pink complexion, are the accompaniments of this type. The "yellow blonde" is another type which is rapidly going out of fashion, and "yellow blondes" are seldom seen now except on the stage. Fanny Davenport is an example of this type. The daughters of Spain and Italy are the best examples of the brunette type of beauty; those of England and Germany of the blonde type; those of southern Ireland of the Irish type; and those of Greece of the Van Dyke type. Here in America we have a mixture of all types, as we have a mixture of all nations. The true American type of beauty, however, is neither of the blonde or brunette, Van Dyke nor Irish, Daniel Gabriel Rossetti, strawberry nor yellow blonde types. The true American beauty has hair soft and brown, eyes of grey or blue, complexion rather white, clear and devoid of rich color, and features not by any means as regular as those of the other types of beauty, but possessing far more expression.

Children's Lunches.

There is something very dampening to the appetite in the aspect of thick bread and butter rolled in a bit of coarse brown paper, with a cookie or two sticking to the parcel, and an apple covered with crumbs at the bottom of the pail. The appearance of such a luncheon will often prevent a delicate child from eating at all. A little care spent in preparation—in cutting the bread trimly and neatly, packing the cake in white paper and the whole in a fresh napkin, in choosing a pretty basket to take the place of the tin pail—is not thrown away. Some children are born fastidious, and with a distaste for food. They require to be tempted to eat at all—tempted, not by unwholesome goodies, but by taking trouble to make simple things dainty and attractive to them. We have heard a grown woman, whose fastidiousness had survived her childhood, describe with a shudder the effect of her dinner basket at school upon her. The very sight of it took away all the appetite, and she went through the afternoon faint and fasting rather than meddle with its contents. By all means bake the custard in a "pretty cup," and do what is possible to give the luncheon an appetizing appearance to the little people, who depend upon it for the working force of their long school day.

Glass in Doors.

In some of the new houses entire glass windows appear in the drawing-room—windows of stained glass. In these are introduced the opalescent glass and the nuggets of glass called jewels. These glass jewels are used as inlays with admirable effect. Wide license is permitted in the matter of window draperies and portieres for the parlor. In many houses the curtain that comes next to the window is a pongee shade, ornamented in outline stitch. Next to this comes, perhaps, a curtain of Madras muslin, in soft, delicate cream color, or a curtain of scrim, with antique lace let in. Then there are Syrian curtains of lemon-hued muslin worked in old gold threads, which are fashionably hung singly at a window, to be looped at one side with gold-colored ribbon. The inner curtains are of some rich, luxurious fabric. Satin, triple-lined and bordered with embroidered bands, are popular inner curtains. Plush in solid colors, also silk velours, are largely employed for the same purpose. It matters not so much what the material is, so that it is rich in color and of a texture that admits of its hanging in graceful folds. The inner curtains should be ample in their folds, and the lower edge ought to touch the floor and partly rest upon it. The arch or sliding doors between the parlor and the room adjoining affords an excellent opportunity for the display of fine drapery. Sometimes the portiere hangs in one single curtain, but oftener it is in two parts, and is suspended from a rod and rings, after the fashion of the window draperies. Portieres, as a rule, are made of heavier materials, though they may match the window curtains. When material of solid color is employed the curtains are finished with a figured or embroidered band at the bottom. Mantel draperies employ rich fabrics, such as velours, plush and Lahore satin in plain colors, with hand-embroidered decoration. A style of mantel drapery distinguished for richness of effect consists of a lambrequin of plush arranged in panels, and embroidered with gold threads and edged with heavy bullion fringe.

Beauty and Medical Advice.

Calling on a prominent physician lately, writes a New York gentleman, I saw in his office a good looking young woman who had brought a child for treatment. After the patient had left, he made the remark, "I gave that woman some advice which she did not expect." "What was it?" I naturally inquired. "I told her," said he, "to go to the dentist and have her teeth attended to. She will lose them soon, if she does not, and then her good looks will go also. I am advising women," continued the doctor, "to avoid wearing themselves out by hard work, and I urge this for their husbands' sake, which is the strongest argument. There are so many adventuresses here ready to lure men away that a word of warning is proper. Just look at the Helyn Leonarde case, which ended in shooting and three years in the penitentiary. I find," continued he, "that most women are anxious to save money, and will work hard to the injury of health, and then when the money is made somebody else often gets it. I see these things, and that's the reason I told that woman to attend to her teeth."

Plumage.

The Schools of Design for Women have afforded a great variety of models of artistic beauty in graceful lines and intricate patterns of large lobe and oak-shaped leaves, others of pinnate and feathery shape, interlocked rings, helmets and heraldic devices. These are braided with soutache upon the new cloth pelisses or polonaises. Other styles for the autumn are trimmed with a fur border, nor is that bouffancy apparent in these new garments that formerly made a weight to be deplored.

The strong Oriental tendency toward all that is rich, luxurious and of glowing coloring invades table damask of all descriptions. Golden threads intersect and outline the wide borders and in some of the richest designs the glittering threads are interwoven through the entire fabric. The fringes are also of gold headed by broche figures to correspond.

Luxurious sofa cushions are stuffed with down and covered with soft Aubusson tapestry. On creamy ground there are strawberry-red bars or centers of cupids and butterflies, or huge rich clusters of flowers; a pair of doves form some of the designs.

The dainty Madras window draperies are seen in fresher designs. A delicate specimen of creamy ground is woven with crimson silk detached flowers, the border is gold and gray. Another style is striped with pale pink, gold and a deeper ecru.

Exquisitely fine real lace draperies have an almost invisible mesh, over which drift with careless grace white lilies, ferns, vines, and all manner of small flowers. Some of the other designs are like frostwork on glass.

Long, loose-wristed mousquetaire gloves will retain their popularity. Some of these have arrived at the length of one yard, but are intended only for evening wear.

Some antique guipure curtains have a Florentine border and dado. Venetian point forms the border, half a yard wide, of another style.

Cloth toques and velvet jockey caps will be worn with costumes of cloth and of velvet.

Hoop ear-rings, set with diamonds and other jewels, are very fashionably worn.

Some of the ecru Nottingham curtains might be mistaken for real guipure.

The blouse bodice ranks next to the Camargo bodice in popularity.

A Man Kissing Mr. Beecher.

New York Times: Just before the 5:18 train from Philadelphia, over the Pennsylvania road, rushed into the Jersey City station yesterday afternoon there was a pyrotechnic display in the western sky. The sun, which had been hidden all day, came into sight, a blazing ball of vermillion, and set fire to a bank of clouds which stretched terrace-like across the sky. Judge Advocate General Horatio C. King of Brooklyn supervised an impromptu reception, which followed, to the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, who came in on the train. It was a little reception, and consisted principally of reporters and Mr. John T. Howard's kiss. There were a dozen reporters and only one kiss. The kiss was imprinted directly upon Mr. Beecher's ruby-colored lips, and the sight of a little man stretching up on tip-toe to print a resounding smack upon the lips of a much larger man was so unusual, that it was the feature of the reception. Passengers who came in on the train with Mr. Beecher and witnessed the proceeding were amused, disgusted, or shocked, according as it struck them.

Mr Beecher did not flinch. He had been there before and was used to Mr. Howard's novel mode of greeting men. Henry A. Richardson, B. F. Blair, Rossiter W. Raymond, H. W. B. Howard, Abijah Whitney and Horatio C. King, who assisted Mr. Howard in the reception, merely shook Mr. Beecher's hand and followed his example in also shaking Mrs. Beecher by the hand and extending to both a cordial welcome home. When Mr. Howard had detached himself from Mr. Beecher's lips and gotten out from under Mr. Beecher's drab English tourist hat, which much resembled a very much soiled Seventh regiment helmet, Mr. Beecher's face was found to be much more ruddy than usual. His aldermanic outlines were only ill-defined underneath a loose duster of black farmer's satin. When seated on the Cortland street ferry boat, it was plain that the ponderous form had not wasted away during the trip of 18,550 miles, which began July 9 and ended yesterday.

Thanksgiving Day Fixed.

The president has issued the following Thanksgiving proclamation:

By the President of the United States of America—A Proclamation: In furtherance of the custom of this people at the close of each year to engage upon a day set apart for that purpose in a special festival of praise to the giver of all good, I, Chester A. Arthur, president of the United States, do hereby designate Thursday, the 29th day of November next, as a day of national thanksgiving. The year which is drawing to an end has been replete with evidences of divine goodness. The prevalence of health, fullness of harvests, stability, peace and order, the growth of fraternal feelings, the spread of intelligence and learning, the continued enjoyment of civil and religious liberty—all these and countless other blessings are cause for reverent rejoicing. I do therefore recommend that on the day above appointed the people rest from their accustomed labors, and meeting in their several places of worship express their devout gratitude to God that he hath dealt so bountifully with this nation, and pray that his grace and favor abide with us forever.

(Signed) CHESTER A. ARTHUR.

Secretary of State.

A Woman's Story.

Pall Mall Gazette: Mr. Oscar Wilde's American story, which we noticed yesterday, was first introduced to England, or at least to London, by Sir Charles Bowen, at a great bar dinner about this time last year. It was then given as happening in a church, and the notice was: "Please do not shoot the organist; he does his best." This remote American town, which possessed at least one church and one organist, and evidently a high standard of taste in ecclesiastical service, was not improbably the same which on another occasion boasted of three places of worship. Each of these, as a rule, was crowded, till on one Sunday morning when the assembling worshippers found each church or chapel fast locked and inaccessible. There was, for the moment, no resource but to disperse. Later in the day, however, the mystery was solved. A young lady in the town had sent an anonymous letter to each clergyman in the following terms: "All is discovered; fly." And they fled.

Hydrophobia.

Miss Barry, an eighth-year-old daughter of a prominent citizen of Germantown, Pa., died Thursday from hydrophobia after twenty-six hours of most intense suffering. She was bitten about six months ago by a pet dog, but no attention was paid to it until last evening, when she became speechless and was seized with violent spasms, barking and snarling in a vicious manner at those around her bedside.

Every young man should prepare for future usefulness by taking the thorough course of training at H. B. Bryant's Chicago Business College.

BOSTON'S FAIR BIBBERS.

A Quiet Nook Where Boston Dames and Damsels Retire to Sip Their Beer and Puff the Enticing Cigarette.

Boston, Mass., Special Correspondence: I made a discovery the other day that rather surprised me, and at the same time set me to thinking. This discovery was nothing less than of a retreat where throughout the day and evening thirty female souls congregate in large numbers and pay all homage due to glorious King Gambrinus. Women in bar-rooms is not an uncommon sight in Boston, but a beer saloon entirely supported by respectable women—and there is no doubt as to the respectability of most of them—has, up to the present time, been quite unknown here. Whether or not such an institution is a novelty in the West I am in ignorance, but it most certainly is in this old fogy and straight-laced town. I "got on to it" accidentally. Just on the outskirts of the shopping district of the city, but still in its very heart, is a little back street which bears the historical name of Tamworth. It is very little traveled as compared with the rushing throngs which pass along the adjoining thoroughfares, and there are no stores or other places, save one or two, fronting upon it. The rear entrances of buildings face upon it mainly. I happened to dodge down it the other afternoon as a short cut and my eye caught the sign of a beer saloon. Almost at the same time I was seized with uncontrollable thirst—a strange coincidence. I stepped inside, when, to my astonishment, a vision, not altogether of loveliness, but one of femininity burst upon me. The place was not large, but there were some two dozen ladies of all ages and positions in life present, sitting at tables and guarded by mugs of foaming lager beer, which they were busily engaged in drinking. At the further end of the apartment was a small bar, and staring me boldly in the face was a placard which informed me that "pickled pigs feet and sour krout" was obtainable. I had not entirely recovered from my surprise when I was confronted by a rather good-looking young waiter-girl who carried half a dozen empty beer glasses in one hand and a wet towel in the other, and who addressed me simply as "Well." But I was quite equal to the emergency, and answered "Beer." The fairy beer-jerker looked me all over, and then motioned me to follow her, which I did, and was shortly seated in an out-of-the-way corner of the saloon with a mug of beer in front of me. I improved the opportunity to "take in" the place visually. There were about ten long beer tables in the room, some being covered with fine white table cloths and a few without. The floor was quite clean and lightly covered with fine house sand. The walls were papered and hung with cheap framed pictures. On the whole the surroundings were but those of the ordinary beer saloon, and I felt perfectly satisfied that the attraction of the place was not its beauty. The fact was plainly apparent that it was not beauty but beer. Behind the bar stood a red-headed Amazon—the "boss" of the saloon and the chief thrower-out of men who intrude and make themselves obnoxious to the female patrons of the place. She was a female John L. Sullivan. The only other person of masculine gender present besides myself was a callow youth who rinsed out empty beer glasses. He seemed to be in constant fear of the red-headed woman who, by the way, exercised her muscle by pumping beer. Upon my entrance the hum of conversation had ceased, and two dozen pair of eyes, some bleared, I am sorry to say, were turned upon me. Finding that I was safe in the clutches of the waiter girl, they soon returned to their beer and cigarettes.

THEY ALSO SMOKE.

One-half the ladies were gently puffing away at cigarettes in a manner quite proper. Some of them were expert enough to blow pretty little rings of smoke that sailed up into the air, and, watched by the fair maker, broke and then disappeared. At two of the tables the smoke was so thick as to almost hide the faces of the smokers. I was greatly amused in watching one of the ladies taking her first lesson in smoking. She put the cigarette daintily between her red lips and touched a match to it as if she was afraid it would explode like a fire-cracker, "pulled" away at it with all her strength. But she was inexperienced and "pulled" too hard, for the smoke went down into her lungs, choking her and causing considerable commotion for the time being. Such chattering and bursts of laughter! It was talk, talk, talk, singularly and collectively, with no intermissions for rest. And the subjects. They reached from religion and fashion to art and politics. Each related her experiences while shopping that day, and told of the great bargains she might have obtained "if she only had the money." The latest gossip was retailed in the most interesting manner, with spicy personal comments. Politics were only touched upon incidentally, but all seemed to admire Ben Butler as their ideal hero. All present seemed to be convivial spirits. I noticed the manner in which they disposed of their beer. They did not pour it down their throats man fashion, but sipped it as one would wine. Another thing I noticed was that each paid for her own refreshment, and that "treating" evidently was not popular with them. None seemed ill at ease, and, on the contrary, appeared to be quite at home. Two glasses was about the limit of individual indulgence, although I saw one stout matron dispose of five beers in comparatively quick succession. There was no boisterousness, rough expressions or actions, and, to tell the truth, they were as well behaved as if they were attending a tea party. The majority of them were of the better class, and I saw but one who appeared "off color." Americans predominated. All were well dressed, many of them wearing costly silks and valuable jewelry. Some were undoubtedly mothers, others daughters of well-to-do people. They came and went, bidding good-bye to friends, and promising to see them at some later day in the same place. They generally came in in pairs, and seating themselves at a table, would heave a sigh of thankfulness for at last being able to sit down and rest, and would then order a "Boston" or an "after tea." An "after tea" I found to be a small glass of beer, while a "Boston" was a little larger. Occasionally a dame of mature years would call for a little claret or sherry, and I am sorry to say that one of the women ordered a gin fizz. This one, however, was the girl who was a little "off color." Lunch was frequently ordered with the beer. Men with female companions also dropped in, and occasionally a lone representative of the sterner sex made his appearance, and was cared for after the same manner as I had been. There is one thing I can say truthfully, in addition to what I have already related, and that is that the beer was of the best quality. Perhaps this is one reason that the place is so popular with the women. But is the idea likely to grow? I think it is. In my opinion the time will come before long when bar rooms for the exclusive patronage of women will be quite common. I am led to believe this from what I have seen and from statements recently made by a prominent physician of this city. This gentleman has a large practice among the upper classes, and it was with every appearance of sincerity that he told me a short time ago that drinking among women was alarmingly upon the increase. He has several wealthy patients whom he treats for dipsomania, or in other words, for tippling.

The women, he said, do not get drunk as men do, and then get over it; but they drink from bottles hid in their rooms small quantities of liquor at frequent intervals. Many of them secure a bottle of liquor, lock themselves in their rooms, and deliberately drink to intoxication, immediately retiring to sleep off the effect of their deep potations. Their appetite for drink is frequently gained at the table, where wine is served; and again, women will drink, as men do, to forget their troubles. There is one well-known lady in this city who is worth a cool [illegible] when the desire seizes her she drinks until she is beastly intoxicated. Dipsomania is the skeleton in the closet of many a household which would otherwise be the abiding place of happiness.

A Northwestern Vennor.

S. D. Brear, of Randalls, Iowa, forecasts the coming winter as follows: Moderate weather until about Nov. 20; cold weather until the first part of January except three or four days moderate early in December. January will be moderate, and some days warm until the 22d and 23d, when the weather will gradually grow cold, but not quite as cold as last winter at that time. Some days in February it will be cold. The cold weather will last until the 9th or 10th of March, when a break-up will occur. We will have some severe storms in December and February.

The Milwaukee in Dakota.

The new route to St. Paul via the Jamestown River Valley line and the Hastings & Dakota division of the Milwaukee & St. Paul and Jamestown is proving very popular with the traveling public. It is said that regular mail services will be placed on the line the 1st of November. The track of the Southern Minnesota division of the Milwaukee & St. Paul railroad will be completed from Howard City to the Jamestown river at Forrestburg this week. Work on the company's bridge at that place is progressing rapidly, and the trains will cross next week. Only eight miles of track then remain to be laid to connect with the Jamestown River Valley line at Woonsocket. With the completion of this line, the company's work of construction in this part of the Territory will cease until spring; but Southern Dakota's railroad net work is now as complete as that of Southern Minnesota or Northern Iowa.

IN THE SWING.

Bertha and Reine, Susie and May,
Out in the sunshiny weather—
Four little loves, with eyes like doves,
All in the swing together.

Dresses of white, pink, amber, and blue,
With many a tinkling bangle—
Ribbons and curls, ruffles and girls,
All in a rainbow tangle.

Away they go high, 'mid bending boughs
That sweet May blossoms cover;
Down they come low, where daisies grow,
And round pink heads of clover.

Laughing and chirping, singing like birds—
Birds without even a feather—
Swiftly they fly; then "let her die,"
All in the swing together.

IF!

If all the flowers in all the world
Were changed to shining gold,
And every bush in the garden hung
As full as its boughs would hold;
If every tree in the groves and woods
Was glistening silvery white
With dollars and halves and quarters, too,
Solid and round and bright,—
Would all the silver and all the gold
Make earth a lovelier place?
We'd sigh for sight of an opening rose,
Or a pansy's dewy face.

We'd give the glaring blossoms away,
And all the silver sheen,
For dear Dame Nature's tender flowers
And leaves of beautiful green.

FOR THE LITTLE FOLKS.

A Baffled Bridegroom.

Aunt Targood's gander had been the terror of many well-meaning people, and of some evil-doers, for many years. I have seen tramps and pack-peddlers enter the gate and start on toward the door, when there would sound that ringing warning like a war blast, "Honk, honk!" and in a few minutes these unwelcome people would be gone. Farm house boarders from the city would sometimes enter the yard, thinking to draw water by the old well-sweep: in a few minutes it was customary to hear shrieks, and to see women and children flying over the walls, followed by air-rending "honks!" and jubilant cackles from the victorious gander and his admiring family.

Aunt Targood sometimes took summer boarders. Among those that I remember was Rev. Mr. Bonney, a fervent-souled Methodist preacher. He put the gander to flight with the cart whip on the second day after his arrival, and seemingly to aunt's great grief; but he never was troubled by the feathered tyrant again.

Young couples sometimes came to Father Bonney to be married, and one summer afternoon there rode up to the gate a very young couple, whom we afterwards learned had run away, or rather, had attempted to get married without their parents approval. The young bridegroom hitched the horse and helped from the horse the gayly-dressed miss he expected to make his wife. They started up the walk upon the run, as though they expected to be followed, and haste was necessary to prevent the failure of their plans.

"Honk!"

They stopped. It was a voice of authority. "Just look at him!" said the bride. "Oh! oh!"

The bridegroom said "Shoo!" but he might as well have said "Shoo" to a steam engine. On came the gander, with his head and neck upon the ground. He seized the lad by the calf of his leg, and made an immediate application of his wings. The latter seemed to think he had been attacked by dragons. As soon as he could shake him off he ran. So did the bride, but in another direction; and while the two were thus perplexed and discomfited, the bride's father appeared in a carriage, and gave her a most forcible invitation to ride home with him. She accepted it without discussion. What became of the bridegroom, or how the matter ended, we never knew.

Dorsey's Brain Affected.

Gath: I have seen a gentleman just returned from Mr. Dorsey's ranch in New Mexico. He says that he found the ex-senator very much depressed and melancholy, not so much from his trial, although that had kept him under a terrible nervous tension for two years, as because of the great mistake he discovers that he made by criticising President Garfield, who was so many years his friend. "Dorsey," said my informant, "is a man very easily imposed upon, although he has much cleverness. After he went out to his place, hoping to be relieved from mankind for some time while he might recuperate, a reporter was dispatched all that long distance to poke him up again. He was in bad physical and mental health, somewhat careless in his passing habits, and things were gotten out of him which in his natural mind he would never have said, and probably did not mean. After that, men who had stood by him for his good qualities and misfortunes through years, wrote him depreciating letters upon these interviews, which were made to belittle and even befoul the dead man. Since that time he has been more depressed than his friends have ever known him to be. He is not good company now for his acquaintances and they hope that he will be let alone and clothed in his right mind at an early day."

Georgia Fruit-Trees in Bloom.

From the Sumpter Republican.

The weather at this time is perhaps the most remarkable for the time of the year within the knowledge of the oldest inhabitant. On Tuesday the thermometer was up in the eighties, and the day was warm enough for garden work. A gentleman told us that he had an appletree of the June variety that has never blossomed before, but it now has large apples just beginning to ripen. We see peach, apple, and cherry trees in bloom, and we know of one cherry-tree that bore in the early season that now has a second crop of green fruit for this year. This may be put down as another of the remarkable incidents of 1881.

Personal Paragraphs.

A Waverly, N. Y., girl named Rollison, entitled to $2,000 back pension and $8.00 a month front pension, gave up the claim in order to marry a chap who, the Elmira telegram says, can't pay her board.

The princess of Wales, while at Singleton Abbey the other day, planted a linden as a memorial of her visit. She was requested to place her hand on the tree while the earth was being filled in around it; but, instead of being content with so passive a part, she seized a heavy garden spade, and shoveled in the earth with skill and vigor, laughing heartily the while.

Mr. Dix, the rector of Trinity church, New York, and Mr. Morgan, the rector of St. Thomas, in that city, are very wealthy men, having inherited large estates, and draw large salaries; but a letter to the Cincinnati Gazette says they are neither gifted nor attractive preachers, and owe their exaltation chiefly to outside circumstances.

The language of Lord Denman at the trial of Oxford for shooting at Queen Victoria, is pat for the Guiteau case: "But although he labored under a delusion, if he fired the loaded pistol at the queen knowing the result which would follow his conduct, and although forced by his morbid desire for notoriety to the act, he would be responsible for his conduct and liable to criminal punishment."

Bob Toombs is as notorious for his hospitality as for being one of the most rabid of the unreconstructed rebels. Not long since it was proposed to build a hotel in Washington, Ga., where he lives, and a committee called upon him for a subscription. "What the hell do you want of a hotel in Washington?" he cried. "Every respectable person who comes to town puts up with Bob Toombs, and is welcome; and every disreputable person leaves town because he can not put up anywhere." Such being the case, the project was abandoned.

Brayton Ives, a New Yorker, paid $15,000 for an illuminated missal the other day not too large to slip into an overcoat pocket, if, like those in Mr. George Bancroft's overcoat, the pocket is make big enough to take in an octavo volume. This is probably the largest price ever paid in this country for one book. In England $36,000, paid for a Guttenburg Bible on paper, is high-water mark in book prices.

Joseph Wilson, who was well known in war times as a lieutenant on the rebel cruiser Alabama, was killed on a railroad, near Tallahassee, Florida, a few days ago. He was on the Alabama at the time of the action with the Kearsage, and he was with the noted Mrs. Greenough when she lost her life off the North Carolina coast. Wilson and Mrs. Greenough left a blockade runner in a yawl in order to slip between the federal war vessels. The yawl was capsized in a storm, Mrs. Greenough was drowned and Wilson barely managed to swim ashore.

General Porfirio Diaz was married in the City of Mexico recently to a daughter of Romero Rubio. The Rubio family once was hated by Diaz, and when he was president he drove Romero into exile. Romero came to the United States, and his daughter, now the wife of Diaz, was educated here. A magnificent residence has been built for the bride. The building faces exactly north and south and is of an architectural design entirely unlike any other building in Mexico. From a distance it resembles a pagoda, and a combination of brilliant colors serves to make it conspicuous.

Mr. Guilford Onslow, on the occasion of a recent visit to the Tichborne claimant at Port-sea convict-prison, found him in a state of great depression. He frequently remarked, "They've got me here and mean to keep me here." The claimant has completed under the "mark" system, ten of the fourteen years to which he was originally sentenced, though he has actually been in prison only seven years and eight months.

Henry J. Spooner, who was nominated last week by the republicans of the first Rhode Island district to fill the congressional vacancy caused by the promotion of Mr. Aldrich to the senatorship, is a prominent lawyer of providence, a veteran soldier of distinguished record, and a man of considerable legislative experience, having served continuously as a member of the Rhode Island house of representatives since 1875, and twice been elected speaker. Ex-Governor Van Zandt was the leading contestant against him for the nomination.

How Postage Stamps Are Made.

The number of ordinary postage stamps issued in 1881 was 954,128,440, and the value $24,010,643. The method of printing postage stamps is described in the Scientific American as follows: The printing is done from steel plates, on which two hundred stamps are engraved, and the paper used is of a peculiar texture, somewhat resembling that employed for bank notes. Two men cover the plates with colored inks and pass them to a man and girl who print them with large rolling hand-presses. Three of these little squads are employed all the time, although ten presses can be put in operation, if necessary. The colors used in the inks are ultra-marine blue, Prussian blue, (green), vermillion and carmine.

After the sheets of paper on which the 200 stamps are engraved have been dried, they are sent into another room and gummed. The gum used is made of the powder of dried potatoes and other vegetables mixed with water. Gum arabic is not desirable, because it cracks the paper badly. The sheets are gummed seperately, they are placed back upward upon a flat wooden support, the edge being seperated by a metallic frame, and the gum is applied with a wide brush. After having been again dried, this time on little racks, which are fanned by steam power for about an hour, they are put in between sheets of pasteboard, and pressed between hydraulic presses, capable of applying a weight of 2,000 tons.

The sheets are next cut in halves; each sheet, of course, when cut contains 100 stamps. This is done by a girl with a large pair of shears, cutting by hand being preferred to that of machinery, which method would destroy too many stamps. They are then passed to the perforating machine. The perforations between the stamps are effected by passing the sheets between two cylinders provided with a series of raised bands which are adjusted to a distance apart equal to that required between the rows of perforations. Each ring on the upper cylinder has a series of cylindrical projections which fit corresponding depressions in the bands of the lower cylinder; by these the perforations are punched out, and by a simple contrivance the sheet is detached from the cylinders, in which it has been conducted by an endless band.

The rows running longitudinally of the paper are first made, and then by a similar machine the transverse ones. This perforating machine was invented and patented by a Mr. Arthur in 1852, and was purchased by the government for $20,000. The sheets are next dressed once more, and then packed and labeled and stowed away in another room, preparatory to being put up in mail-bags for dispatching to fulfill orders. If a single stamp is torn or in any way multilated the whole sheet of 100 is burned. Five hundred thousand are burned every week from this cause. The sheets are counted no less than eleven times during the process of manufacturing, and so great is the care taken in counting that not a single sheet has been lost during the past twenty years.

Facts and Fancies.

An idea for the present rage of speculation in Paris may be formed from an account of the union generale, a bank, or rather financing company, started in 1878 by some rich Catholics. The "Catholic interest" gathered round the Union, it took Austria for its field of action, established a land bank in Vienna, and "financed" railways, iron mines and foundries in Bohemia and Hungary. Its business expanded so rapidly that in less than three years its called up capital was raised from £250,000 to £6,000,000, while its deposits at a fixed rate reached £4,000,000. It is believed to control a capital of £20,000,000.

The appetite for false teeth is growing to an alarming extent. Careful statistics show that in this country alone twelve manufactories produce ten million teeth annually, "or one to every five persons in the United States." The amount annually squandered on teeth is $1,060,000. A half a million of gold is used every year to fill teeth. We are not alarmists but if this extravagance is not checked there will be another panic.

The Portland, Maine, fisherman were unusually successful during the season now drawing to a close. About 100,000 barrels of mackerel have been pickled there this year, an increase of 20,000 over last year. The best trip of the season was made a few days ago by the schooner Alice M. Gould. She left Portland on Saturday, November 5, and returned the following Thursday with 45,000 pounds of fish, having sailed about 400 miles. Her profits were $1,200, giving each man of the crew $80.

Dr. Lewis Balch of Albany, in a scientific review of the medical evidence in the wife-murder trial of Jesse Billings, makes some interesting statements. One is, that a ball fired through glass may make a hole enough smaller than the full size of the ball before firing as to prevent an unfired ball of like caliber passing. In an experiment with a ball it was found that the hole made was too small by one-third to let the ball pass through.

CROOKSTON, - MINNESOTA.

Congress will reassemble in less than a month and then Washington will be a point of more national interest than at present. After the organization of the time branches and the reception of the president's message and accompanying reports, and other preliminary business. The work of president making will begin in earnest and may continue until next July. Politicians of all lines will be drawn to the national capital from whence will radiate schemes to enlist the wire-working politicians, at home. There will be no end of false reports, humbug and rot, spread before the people from day to day, to the infinite disgust of sensible people who feel that life is too short to digest such sort of stuff.

Lord Coleridge has sailed for England, after spending two months in the United States. During this period he has travelled over 5,000 miles, and despite the hurried character of his trip, he has been able to get a good idea of the country. He has taken kindly to Americans, and Americans have returned the feeling. Perhaps nothing has more commended him than the freedom from dogmatism in the conclusions which he has expressed as the result of his observations. The chief justice's ast speech was delivered at Yale College and was a vigorous defence of the study of the classis. He attributed his own success largely to his constant study of the ancient languages, and mentioned the intersting fact that ever since he left Oxford he has made it a religion, so far as possible, never to let a day pass without reading some Latin and Greek.

The maps of Minnesota and of Dakota, published by Messrs. Warner & Foote 309 Nicollet avenue, Minneapolis, are the latest, most elegant—and what is of vital importance—the most correct of any ever issued. They show the congressional, township range, and section boundaries, together with the railroads, main traveled roads, streams, lakes, organized towns, villages, cities, and town sites, railroad stations, postoffices, and other essential features never before represented. Every business man, and every intelligent citizen, will prize such maps far beyond their cost. People residing in such large areas of country cannot do business intelligently without accurate knowledge of their geographical and topographical features.

An elaborate calculation has recently been made by Mr. Edward Atkinson, a noted statistician of Boston, showing the cost of a loaf of bread made at the east from the grain grown on the fields of Iowa or Dakota, and how the cost is distributed. This history of the cost of a loaf of bread is a very interesting and ingenious one, and at the same time very simple. Of the value of 100 barrels of flour, $300 goes to the Dakota farmer, the freight to Boston will be $197.50; the the barrels will cost $45, the grinding $50, and the commissions and cartage, $30, making the total cost of the hundred barrels of flour $682.50 when the flour reaches Boston. The baker then takes the hundred barrels of flour and adds $210 worth of oven-heat and yeast and $200 worth of labor, so that when the flour goes into the shop for sale in the shape of 3,000 loaves of bread it has cost $1,092,50—an equivalent of 3 1-2 cents a pound. For this bread the baker or the retail dealer gets 7 cents a pound; that is to say, the baker and grocer in Boston get about one-half of the money paid for a barrel of flour, the farmer gets a fifth, the railroads one-tenth, the miller, merchant and cooper one fourteenth. Mr. Atkinson's object in this calculation seems to have been two-fold—first, and most important, to show the poor people of this country who live from hand to mouth that their bread costs them about double what it would if they should make it at home; and, secondly, that the most of the profit on a loaf of bread does not go to the farmers and to the railroads.

The unfortunate career of Anna Dickinson should be a warning to stage struck women. She had scored great success and made a comfortable fortune as a platform speaker. In her field she scarcely had a rival, and despite the disfavor into which lecturers have fallen of late years, she could always command a large audience. But she suddenly conceived the idea that nature had designed her for an actress, and in middle-life without any previous training in the profession, she began writing plays of her own and assuming the title roles. It was a foregone conclusion that she must fail, but when the critics told the truth she lost her temper, and declared that they had formed a conspiracy to ruin her. She appealed from the critics to the people, but their response was equally disheartening. Her audiences fell away, and her last engagements in eastern cities were flat failures. Still refusing to learn the lesson, Miss Dickinson resolved to abandon the east, and appeal to the critical favor of the wild west, so she organized a company and set out on a tour of the one-night towns. Now this has come to an end. Her manager deserted her the other day in Michigan, and the company has gone to pieces. After years of hard struggle in a hopeless enterprise she has lost all her old prestige, wasted her fortune, and has nothing to show for it all except disappointed ambition.

A. F. Van Hoosear of Minneapolis was arrested at the postoffice in Winona on the 3d inst., by Officer Bassett of Minneapolis, on a charge of embezzlement. Van Hoosear, in company with T. Ennis, had been engaged in keeping a restaurant at 212 Nicholet avenue, known as the Merchants' Lunch, and it is alleged that he sold out the establishment, pocketed the entire proceeds, and decamped, going to Winona under the assumed name of J. Brown. It is understood that the affair was satisfactorily adjusted, and Van Hoosear was released.

The Criminal Record.

United States Marshall of Indiana, R. S. Foster, with a posse of detectives, went to Pike county on the 31st inst., in pursuit of a gang of counterfeiters supposed to be located in that portion of the state. They succeeded in arresting nine of the gang at Steinville, a small village in Pike county about twenty-five miles from Evansville, after a desperate fight. The following are the parties captured: Three brothers named Columbus, Jesse and Joseph Hanchens, Henry Grossmen, Zinney Kinder, Westley Woods, Phil Taylor, Bertie Smithers and Andy Hart. They were all brought to Indianapolis in charge of the marshal.

At New Edinburg, Ark., during the aftershow or concert of Hunter's circus, some unknown parties outside fired a volley of shots into the main exhibition canvas and then beat a hasty retreat, disappearing in the darkness and escaping. Strange to say, only one person was killed, though the seats were crowded. The bullets passed through all sections of the audience, and one of the circus performers was shot through the head, dying in the ring.

Foreign News Gossip.

The London Times attributes the failure of Morris Ranger, the Liverpool cotton broker, to his grossly reckless speculation in England and America and on the continent. It says he aimed to control the cotton exchanges of the world and had the help of wealthy houses in London, New York and Hamburg. The London money market is not affected by them. Probably there will be an increasing demand for cotton, followed by a reaction. The Times severely condemns the wild dealing in futures prevailing in Liverpool, and advises the adoption of the American rules for the deposit of bargins and assumed restriction thereto.

Michael Davitt lectured in St. James hall London to a large, orderly audience. He advocated the nationalization of land, and denounced Salisbury and Northcote for stirring up discord in Ireland. He said the time would come when they would have to defend their illgotten property, not against the land leaguers, but against the enlightened manhood of England. Private property in land, he declared, was robbery of the nation. On motion of Ellen Taylor a vote of thanks to Davitt was passed by the meeting.

A Bad Preacher.

Valley City, Dak. Special: Rev. Isaac M. Frey, for five or six months pastor of the Congregational church of this city, has suddenly left for parts unknown. His financial matters are in very bad shape—that is, for his creditors—he having converted everything into cash, beside, it is reported, taking $150 of church money. Among the property disposed of was some that was mortgaged. He leaves a wife and three children in this city in embarrassed circumstances. Rev. Frey came to Valley City from Washington, D. C., where he married his present wife last spring, he being a widower with three children, and she a widow with an equal number, born of a union of a recently deceased, and it is understood, quite prominent Washingtonian. At the time of the lady's marriage with Frey she knew but little of him, having been acquainted with him but a short time. He carried recommendations from Michigan, however, and his ministerial bearing did the rest. At this time the lady was possessed of the remnant of a small fortune, in amount about $3 000. Out of this she furnished Frey with money to come to Dakota and sent him frequent drafts after his arrival here, and he constantly beseiged her for more money. This she refused to send, and Frey brought her to Valley City, where she deposited about $2,000 in the First National bank and took a check therefor, made payable to herself. To this the reverend forged his wife's name, drew the money and left Mrs. Frey and her children penniless. This action seems to have been premeditated before he arrived in Dakota, as he left his three children at some point in the east. Frey is of small stature, dark complexion, dark eyes, hair slightly tinged with gray, and wore, when last seen, a beard of several weeks' growth, which he will probably cut off at the first opportunity. He is about forty years of age, and has the appearance of a blase man of the world. His wife fainted upon hearing of his desertion of her, and is almost heart-broken on account of her children.

A TERRIBLE TORNADO.

Five Persons Killed, Sixty Injured and Nearly 300 Buildings Blown Down in a Missouri Town.

The city of Springfield, in Green county, Southern Missouri, was the afternoon of the 4th inst., visited by a destructive cyclone, which struck the city from the northwest.

In less than three minutes from 100 to 200 houses were blown down, five persons killed and fifty wounded, and property to the amount of $300,000 blown away or rendered useless. In North Springfield the storm gathered headway and swept towards the east, first demolishing the woolen mills owned by Lord & Regan, entailing a loss of $20,000. The building was of brick. Fortunately the forty or more operatives escaped with their lives, but several were injured by flying timbers and bricks. Near the woolen works the residence of S. Bartlett and W. H. Pennell were blown down, and Mrs. Pennell's hip was broken. Mrs. Mary E. Jackson, who was in a hut, was also dangerously injured in the back. At this spot the houses of J. M. McDoling and J. F. O'Neil were next torn down, and Miss Sallie Edmonson, a lady in the O'Neil house, was instantly killed, and J. A. Walter, a carpenter, terribly wounded on the head. Frank Edmundson, cousin of the dead girl, had his leg broken. The residences of William Carlos, J. B. Smith, D. Whitworth, Dr. Wear, Louis Boland, F. A. Hecker and Sam Core were blown down, as was the new brick Catholic church. Near the church stood the house of A. B. Campbell, where Mrs. Andrews Arnaques, who was making a call, was instantly killed. The wind hurled the building in all directions. Several other houses at this point were wrecked, but fortunately no one was killed. The cyclone was about a hundred yards wide until it reached a point named Bridgeton, when it seemingly spread out to three times that width, and thirty-eight small houses were blown to pieces, and the following persons injured: Emma Berry, leg broken; Mrs. Jane Hoffman, arm broken; Mrs. Atkins, hip injured.

The storm seemed to be at its height at this place, and the houses in some instances were literally torn to pieces, and in one a child was carried 200 feet and dropped uninjured. In the same house Mrs. W. Dunlap was killed, and Mrs. Beeman dangerously wounded. Mrs. Atkins and J. E. Jinckenless were visited by the wind and blown down, and in one a servant, name unknown, fatally injured. Passing from the town, Brookline about ten miles distant, was partially demolished, and ten or fifteen houses destroyed and the inmates injured, and in one of them a Mrs. Holberles was killed. About 250 buildings were more or less injured. Twenty were destroyed, and five persons killed during the passage of the storm. The wounded will number at least sixty, the list being increased every hour.

THE LAND OFFICE.

COMMISSIONER M'FARLAND'S REPORT.

WASHINGTON, Special Telegram, Nov. 1.—The annual report of the commissioner of the general land office is out to-day. He repeats his recommendations for the repeal of the preemption and timber culture laws and for the modification of the homestead laws, and the old story of the abuses growing out of the operation of these laws, which lead him to recommend their repeal or amendment. This subject will, of course, engage the attention of congress next winter. During the last congress a number of bills were introduced to repeal the pre-emption laws and amend the homestead and pre-emption culture laws. The measure was favorably reported by the Hon. H. B. Strait from the house committee on public lands and afterwards, on motion of Mr. Pound, chairman of that committee, engrafted on the sundry civil appropriation bill; but the senate having adopted a rule to exclude new legislation from appropriation bills, struck out the clause, and the measure fell with the expiration of the congress. The subject will be taken up de novo by the next congress, and it remains to be seen whether the proposition becomes a law or not. Some very strong advocates of repeal, among them Mr. Washburn and Mr. Straight of Minnesota, come over from the last house and will very likely urge the passage of the measure. Among other things recommended by the commission is the passage of a law on the question of the forfeiture of certain railroad land grants which he mentions in detail. This is also a ripe subject for the next congress, and a number of members are known to be ready and eager to take it up. Among the roads mentioned are the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba, the Brainerd branch of the St. Paul & Pacific, now Manitoba railroad, the Southern Minnesota railway extension, Hastings & Dakota, and the Lake Superior & Mississippi. These roads have been completed, but not within the time required by law.

THE NORTHERN PACIFIC

is given in the report as one of the roads not completed within the time required by law, but which are in course of construction. The Sioux City & St. Paul belongs to another class of roads, partly completed and, so far as known to the general land office, construction suspended. The commissioner says:

In the absence of congressional action lands have been certified or patented, accordingly as roads have been constructed, whether within or out of the time prescribed. Your immediate predecessor suspended this practice prior to the meeting of congress in December, 1880, but as no legislative action was taken, you have held that under the decision of the supreme court of the United States you had no right to declare a forfeiture or to further suspend the issue of patents for lands along the constructed portion of roads, even if the same had not been built within the prescribed time. The remaining lands are contained in the reservation established by law or under withdrawals made for the protection of the grants. Meanwhile settlers have entered upon some of these lands and are anxious to know whether they must look to the railroad companies or to the United States for their titles. The public demand for a definite settlement of the question, whether a forfeiture is to be enforced in any of these cases is constantly pressed upon my attention. I consider it of very great importance that the earliest possible action should be taken either to revive the grants or declare them forfeited. If it be the judgment of congress that the grants should be revived, congress may unquestionably prescribe the conditions of such revival; and if such action should be taken I suggest that all actual settlers on the land be saved and secured in their rights and claims to land embraced in their settlements and improvements at the date of any such revival of the railway grant.

The commissioner reports that the lands within the old Sioux Indian reservation west of Big Stone lake, in Dakota, have been resurveyed, and the western boundary line retraced, the original surveys having been reported fraudulent. The area shown by the original survey was 115,157.68 acres, and by the resurvey 137,648 acres, making an increase by the resurvey of 22,540.32 acres.

THE DISPOSALS OF PUBLIC LANDS

during the year embraced 19,020,769 acres, and Indian lands 399,235 acres; increase over 1882, about 5,000,000 acres, and over 1881, about 8,000,000. Receipts, financial sources from, disposals of public lands, were $11,088,479, and from Indian lands, $625,404; total, $11,713,883. Public lands were disposed of as follows:

	Acres.
Public sales	273,069
Private entries	2,179,995
Pre-emption entries	2,285,710
Mineral entries	31,520
Homestead entries	8,171,914
Timber culture entries	2,110,930
Entries with military Co. land warrants	45,414
Entries with land claim scrip	10,580
Total number entries filing posted during year	258,685
Increase in acres	30,000,000
Increase in number of claims recorded in 1883 over year 1882	55,548

The report says the timber land entries act is flagrantly violated. Information is in my possession that much of the most valuable timber land remaining in the possession of the government on the Pacific coast is being taken up by home and foreign capitalists through the medium of entries made by persons hired for that purpose. I have found it necessary to suspend all entries of his class and direct an examination.

The commissioner is of the opinion that timb-lands should be reserved by law from ordinary disposal, and sold only after appraisment and upon sealed bids. He recommends that congress make some legislation in relation to private land claims in New Mexico, Colorado and Arizona, and recommends a commissioner for each of these Territories, to be appointed to examine and settle these claims. The commissioner recommends the passage of an act making false and fraudulent returns of public surveys punishable by fine and imprisonment. Much progress has been made in the work of protecting public lands and public timber. The practice of fencing public lands is condemned and the recommendation renewed that an act be passed injoining penalties for this offense and for preventing legal settlement and entry by force and intimidation. The commissioner asks that his salary be fixed at $5,000 and for a moderate increase of salaries of the principal officers and clerks in his depratment. The character and responsibilities of the office together with the fact that its business has increased 82 per cent since 1881, appears to the commissioner to justify this request.

Court of Inquiry Ordered.

The war department has issued a special order appointing a court of inquiry to investigate the cause of the failure of the Greely relief expedition, and report whether the conduct of any officer of the army, in the premises, calls for further proceedings before a general court martial, and reasons for the conclusions they may reach. The detail of the court is: Brig. Gen. S. V. Benet, chief of ordnance; Col. R. B. Ayres, Second artillery; Lieut. Col. O. M. Poe, corps of engineers. Maj. Henry Goodfellow, judge advocate United States army, will act as recorder. The court will meet in Washington on the 8th of November. It is understood that the navy department will not take any further action in the case of commander Frank Wildes, commanding the Yantic, for the part taken by him in the late expedition, unless it shall be deemed expedient as a result of testimony which may be developed in the proceedings of the court of inquiry appointed by the secretary of war.

GEN. HAUPT RESIGNS.

His Retirement From the Management of the Northern Pacific Railroad and the Causes.

From the Pioneer Press, 2d.

For some months past rumors have been current that there were to be radical changes in the operative department of the Northern Pacific. Yesterday the first and most important of the changes were made. It was the retirement of Herman Haupt, general manager, who on Oct. 20 tendered to Vice President Oakes his resignation. In his letter of resignation Mr. Haupt assigns as his cause for retirement an inability to conduct the road in a manner creditable to himself and satisfactory to the company under the restrictions placed upon him by the vice president by order of the board of directors. The change went into effect yesterday, and will be promulgated today by the issuance of the following circular, dated Nov. 1, and signed by Vice President Oakes:

Herman Haupt, general manager, having severed his connection with the Northern Pacific Railroad company, the undersigned, in addition to his duties as vice-president, will for the present also assume the duties of general manager. The correspondence hereto annexed will explain the situation:

The correspondence referred to includes Mr. Haupt's letter of resignation and Mr. Oakes' letter of acceptance in reply thereto. Mr. Haupt's letter, dated Oct. 20, is addressed to Vice-President Oakes, and is as follows:

I have received from you instructions to curtail expenses in every department, to discontinue work in progress and discharge employes who have served the company efficiently. The restrictions that have been placed upon the general manager are of such a nature that I cannot see how it is possible to continue in the management and secure results that will be at the same time creditable to myself and satisfactory to the stockholders. As you propose to devote a considerable portion of your time, personally, to the direction of operations, it is clearly unnecessary to retain the services of a general manager in addition, and I therefore prefer to sever my connection with the company, subject to the conditions of the five-year contract under which I assumed charge in 1881.

Mr. Oakes' reply is dated Oct. 30. It is as follows:

I have received your communication of Oct. 20. The retrenchments ordered by the board of directors are no doubt extremely radical, but they are necessary, and if your plans for the improvement and protection of the property of the company, and the betterment of the condition of its employes, cannot be immediately carried into effect, no one can regret the fact more than myself. You have certainly labored zealously and intelligently to advance the interests you represent. It is true that I expect, as vice president, to devote much time to the supervision of operations personally; and it is also true that, in view of this fact, the necessity for your continuance as general manager will be less imperative. Your resignation is therefore accepted, to take effect Nov. 1 proximo, and the conditions of the contract made with you in 1881 will be complied with.

Mr. Haupt was appointed general manager in April, 1881, succeeding H. E. Sargent, who then retired. Mr. Haupt at the time of his appointment made a five-years' contract with the company. The contract was a binding one, as by it sterms Mr. Haupt's services could not be dispensed with, without his receiving payment for the full term of office his contract called for. The sum fixed as salary was $15,000 per annum, and it is to this stipulation in the contract that Mr. Haupt makes reference in his letter of resignation.

Fortune and Rank.

Samuel Johnson.

In civilized society we all depend upon each other, and our happiness is very much owing to the good opinion of mankind. Now, sir, in civilized society external advantages make us respected. A man with a good coat upon his back meets with a better reception than he who has a bad one.

Sir, you may analyze this and say, "What is there in it?" but that will avail you nothing; for it is part of a general system. Pound St. Paul's church into atoms, and consider any single atom; it is, to be sure, good for nothing. But put all those atoms together and you have St. Paul's church. So it is with human felicity, which is made up of many ingredients, each of which may be shown to be very insignificant.

In civilized society personal merit will not serve you so much as money will. Sir, you make the experiment. Go into the street and give one man a lecture on morality and another a shilling and see which will respect you most. Perhaps he who has a large fortune may not be so happy as he who has a small one; but that must proceed from other causes than from his having the large fortune, for he who is rich in civilized society must be happier than he who is poor, as riches, is properly used, must be productive of the highest advantages. Money, to be sure, of itself, is of no use, for its only use is to part with it.

When I was running about town, a very poor fellow, I was a great arguer for the advantages of poverty, but I was at the same time very sorry to be poor. Sir, all the arguments which are brought to represent poverty as no evil show it to be evidently a great evil. You never find people laboring to convince you that you may live very happily upon a plentiful fortune. So you hear people talking how miserable a king must be, and yet they all wish to be in his place.

LATE MARKET REPORT.

ST. PAUL.

WHEAT—The week opens with the market steady at about Saturday's quotations, the growing strength of the outside market still encouraging holders to maintain their extreme position, notwithstanding the freer movement of wheat in the country. THE FEMALE HUSBAND.

Frank Dubois of Wisconsin Engages in a Most Entertaining Interview.

BRANDON, Wis., Special Telegram, Nov. 1.—Dubois, the man or woman of doubtful sex, whose case has so generally aroused public curiosity, was found by a newspaper reporter, secreted with his companion at a farmhouse seven miles from here last night. The following interview was had, which in a measure clears the mystery surrounding the case:

"Mr. Dubois, you, of course, know the stories that have been circulated concerning you?"

"I do," hesitatingly, and in a voice which could not be mistaken for a man's.

"You are married to Gertrude Fuller, are you not?"

"I am. The ceremony was performed by Rev. H. L. Morrison, in Waupon."

"You insist that you are a man?"

"I do. I am—as long as my wife is satisfied it is nobody's business."

"Mr. Dubois, you look like a woman, act like a woman, and there are dozens of reasons to suppose you are not Frank Dubois, but Mrs. Hudson, a woman. Do you refuse to reveal yourself?"

"There is nothing to reveal."

"If you are caught in this disguise you will be arrested. You should place yourself in your proper light at once, and thus avoid punishment."

"Oh, Frank! for God's sake tell all and have it over," at this moment exclaimed the young and pretty wife, tears streaming down the face.

Dubois looked toward her. His lip trembled with excitement. He burst into tears, sobs choking him for a time. Finally he said "It's true," and endeavored to leave the room. He was restrained and finally was induced to TELL HIS STORY.

He said he was really Mrs. Hudson, and had tired of husband and family, and determined to lose identity as the wife and mother by assuming the guise of a man. "My husband," she said, "went to Illinois last spring. I immediately assumed male attire and went to Waupon, where I had previously met and admired Gertie Fuller. I courted her and we were married, she not knowing me to be a woman until the night after the ceremony was performed. I then induced her to keep silent, which she has done. While living with my husband I helped him support the family, peddling soap and compounding extracts. I was thus led to depend upon myself, and when I took upon myself the support of Gertie, I felt fully able to carry the burden. I papered, painted, made and sold extracts, and we were happy. We were preparing to move to Elgin, Ill., when my husband came upon the scene. After he came to the house I concealed myself for a time, and then took the train for Brandon, Gertie remaining at the house of a friend, following on Tuesday to Brandon, where we stopped at the house of an acquaintance, and came here Tuesday evening. I will not return to live with my husband and propose to wear pants and smoke and earn my living as a man." Mrs. Dubois, or more properly Gertie Fuller, appeared utterly heartbroken, sobbing continuously during the recall of the story. She, however, confirmed the statement. She said, when questioned, that her parents lived in Waupun, where her father and brother were engaged in the nursery business. She had married Frank Dubois, (or Mrs. Hudson), and had, on the night of their marriage, discovered that her husband was of her own sex. They had agreed to live together, and had done so. It was an affair of their own and nobody was concerned but herself. They proposed to go to Fond du Lac and arrange to remove to Illinois, as was intended when the sensational denouement was made that the parties were both women.

THE ARMY.

THE TRANSFER OF COMMANDS.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 1.—The formal transfer of the command of the army from Gen. Sherman to Lieut. Gen. Sheridan took place at noon to-day at the headquarters of the army in the war department building. Gen. Sheridan spent the forenoon in making himself acquainted with the business of the office. Gen. Sherman and the members of his staff rendered him every assistance. Shortly before 12 o'clock the two highest officers of the army called on the secretary of war, Gen. Sherman to take official leave, and Gen. Sheridan to report for duty. The transfer was accomplished quietly without any ceremony whatever beyond the issuance of the general orders notifying the army of the change of commanders. These orders were the last and first official acts respectively of the outgoing and incoming commanders. The two officers remained in conversation some time after the change occurred. Gen. Sheridan received congratulations from prominent gentlemen all over the country. Shortly after the transfer Gens. Sherman and Sheridan held an informal reception, attended by all the officers of the army on duty in Washington and bureau officers of the department. All took official leave of Gen. Sherman, and were by him presented to Gen. Sheridan. Subsequently Gens. Sherman and Sheridan, accompanied by the secretary of war, made an official call upon the president.

THE FORMAL ORDERS.

The following were issued to-day:

Headquarters of the Army, Washington, D. C., Nov. 1.—General Orders No. 77. By and with the consent of the president, as contained in General Orders No. 71, of Oct. 16, 1883, the undersigned relinquishes command of the Army of the United States. In thus severing the relations which have hitherto existed between us, he thanks all the officers and men for their fidelity to the high trust imposed on them during his official life, and will in his retirement watch with parental solicitude their progress upward in the noble profession to which they have devoted their lives.

[Signed] W. T. SHERMAN, General.

Official: R. C. DRUM, Adjutant General.

Headquarters of the Army, Washington, D. C., Nov. 1. General Orders No. 78.—In obedience to the order of the president, promulgated in General Order No. 71, Oct. 17, 1883, from these headquarters, the undersigned hereby assumes command of the army of the United States. The following named officers compose the personal staff of the lieutenant general: Maj. Michael V. Sheridan, assistant adjutant general and military secretary; Capt. William J. Volkmar, Fifth cavalry, aid-de-camp; Capt. James F. Gregory, corps of engineers, aide-de-camp.

P. H. SHERIDAN,
[Signed] Lieutenant General.

Official: R. C. DRUM, Adjutant General.

IN CHICAGO.

CHICAGO, Nov. 1.—The following has just been issued:

Headquarters Division of the Missouri, Chicago, Ill., Nov. 1, 12 m.—General Orders No. 17: I hereby relinquish command of the division of the Missouri in order to assume the new duties assigned me by the president in general orders No. 71, dated Headquarters Army, Oct. 13, 1883. In parting with the officers and soldiers whom I have had the honor to command for the past fourteen years, I desire to express my thanks for the confidence and support given by them to my administration of this division. When I assumed command of it, hostile Indians covered the country west of the Missouri from the boundary line of our possessions from the north to the Concho river in Texas. But few settlements existed and the construction of railroads across the country had only just begun. Since then the Indians have been so far subdued that in the territory formerly occupied by them. Cities, towns and cattle interests have grown up and railroads have been built. In these great changes the troops of the division have been active and important agents during these many years. It has been my especial gratification that I have had no disagreement with my subordinates, and that from the department commander to the private soldier, faithful services have been rendered to the government. With the assurance that I shall always remember the hardships suffered, the battles fought, the results achieved and the gallant comrades who have lost their lives in savage warfare, I resign a command that has been to me a pleasure as well as a duty.

[Signed.] P. H. SHERIDAN.

General Orders No. 18.—In compliance with general orders No. 71, headquarters of the army, dated Oct. 13, I hereby assume command of the division of the Missouri. Capt. William Wherry, Sixth infantry, and First Lieut. Charles B. Schofield, Second cavalry, are announced as aides-de-camp.

[Signed.] J. M. SCHOFIELD,
Major General, U. S. A.

MINNESOTA NEWS.

Women Cannot Vote For County Superintendents.

D. L. Kiehle, superintendent of public instruction, was recently requested by a county superintendent to state whether women could vote for county superintendent of schools. Being in some doubt on the subject, Mr. Kiehle submitted the question to the attorney general of the state who has filed the following opinion:

You ask: Can women cast their votes for the office of county superintendent? and, if so by what method. I answer they cannot. In my opinion Sec. 8 of Article VII. of the Constitution is an enabling enactment. It does not, therefore, confer the elective franchise upon women. It simply authorizes the legislature to make provision for women voting at any election held for the purpose of choosing any officer for the schools, or upon any measure relating to the schools. It, therefore, was necessary for the legislature to act in the premises before any right could be claimed under this section. That the legislature have the power to authorize women to vote for county superintendent, I have no doubt. But they have not seen fit to do so. Her right to vote is by Sec. 13 of laws relating to public schools limited to the school district of which she shall at the time have been for ten days a resident. Sec. 14 makes provisions for her voting in cities or villages whose act of incorporation provides for the election of school officers at the charter election, and authorizes the use of a separate ballot box in which to deposit her ballot. A similar arrangement would be required were she to vote for county superintendent. In view, therefore, of this positive limitation, as well as the absence of proper and necessary provisions for receiving and canvassing, it seems to me clear that at present women have no right to vote for county superintendent. Gen. Wilson came to the same conclusion in an opinion dated Aug. 17, 1876.

SHORT AND SWEET.

Mr. James McCoy Finds the Man He's Been Wanting to Meet for Years.

Pittsburg Commercial Gazette.

For three weeks John L. Sullivan has been daring the eastern cities to produce a man at any of his entertainments that could stand up before him for four rounds. He offered as an inducement to pay the successful man $250 for his trouble. Not until he reached McKeesport, where he showed last night, did a man offer himself. James McCoy, the Sharpsburg puddler, appeared with him and was knocked out in twenty seconds. McCoy is a local slugger of some repute. He has figured in quite a number of matches, and usually came off victorious. His last effort was with Callahan at the Shakespeare hotel, East End, where the police interfered after one round. He said previous to going on that he had been anxious to meet Sullivan for years, and that he did not believe that any man could knock him out in four rounds. When Sullivan stepped out the audience forgot to applaud, and a murmur of admiration was all that could be heard. As McCoy emerged from the wings the contrast was painful. Manager Maloy said: "I pity that man, but he was well warned." McCoy weighs 160 pounds, has a cock eye, and his broad chest is covered by tattoo work representing flowers, anchors, white and blue snakes and wide-mouthed dragons. His good eye increased visibly in size as it surveyed the lion-like bearing of the invincible Sullivan. The snakes and reptiles seemed to be in motion on his quivering chest, but despite this he stepped forward with firmness and shook hands with the man he has "been wanting to meet for years." The word given, he began immediately to reach out for Sullivan's face. The blows were neatly stopped, and the Boston boy's great right-arm blow was almost delivered, when it was recalled. He changed front, slapped McCoy lightly with his right on either cheek, squared off, sprang into the air, and sent in a short, half-arm blow with his left that would have gratified anybody's curiosity. McCoy's heels flew into the air, and he lit on his head and shoulders with a frightened look in his face. Under the rules he had ten seconds to get up. He stirred uneasily, raised his head and requested his friends to pull him into the flies. Sullivan stood undecided for a few seconds while the crowd cheered, when he suddenly strode off the stage. His first remark was: "I was afraid to hit him when I intended to do it. I would have broken his jaw."

McCoy only had one mark of any consequence, but that extended all over one side of his face. Where the flesh curled up under the blow, it burst open in ridges. His eye had almost started its socket, and both lips were split on his teeth. He did not have much to say further than, "It will take——little champion to do me after this."

THE OLD WAR GENERALS.

Those Now Living, and Their Present Pursuits.

Correspondence of the Boston Advertiser.

"Only eighteen years ago that the rebellion closed," said an old army officer to me, the other day, "but the generals of the war are fast going out of sight." "Then he went on to say: "Meade, Thomas, Hooker, Garfield, Kilpatrick, Burnside and Halleck are dead. The next few years will see that list lengthened. General Grant is well on towards 70. He comes to Washington often, and walks quietly about the streets, with his cigar in his mouth, better dressed than when he was president, and looks as if life agreed with him. Sherman is 64, and he looks older, but the family is hardy, and he is likely to see 1900. The youngest of all the great leaders is Sheridan, now to command the army, and he is but 51. Sheridan was a major general at 30. Fitz John Porter appears here every winter, white-haired and broken in frame—a little old gentleman, who looks back on twenty years of disgrace. His old commander, McClellan, now a rotund man, with bending shoulders, has not changed much of late. He is rich, and entertains well in his New York City home, but the activity of his life is over. He likes still to tell of his campaigns. Pleasonton, the hero of a hundred cavalry fights, lives quietly here, and can be found any day reading the papers in one of the offices on newspaper row. His hair and mustache are white, and his voice as gentle as a woman's. You can say the same of Rosecrans, the idol of the army of the Cumberland. He and his wife live, almost unnoticed, on Capitol Hill during the time he spends here performing his duties as a California congressman. His complexion is like a youth's and his hair, with a military cut, white as snow. The man who commanded 100,000 men at Chickamauga seems abashed at the confusion in congress, and seldom rises to speak. Generals Hawley and Logan are the two other most distinguished generals in congress. Both are 57 years old, but neither has a gray hair. General Rosecrans will be reinforced this winter by an old companion in the Western armies, General Slocum, of Brooklyn. He has been in congress before. He served, I believe, four years soon after the close of the war. General Sickles is practicing law in New York, and Stoneman is governor of California. Doubleday, who was in Fort Sumpter when it was fired upon, lives in New York and is writing a book; Humphreys, Hunter and Crittenden may be seen almost any day about this city, they own fine houses and live handsomely on the retired list. Fremont is no longer rich. He and his wife, Jessie Benton Fremont, are forgotten in crowded New York. The general whom the Vermont troops worshiped, George J. Stannard, with one arm gone and a half a dozen wounds, sits up at the capitol during the sessions, tending the door of the members' gallery of the house. The democrats promise that he shall not be disturbed. He is so inoffensive that the pushing women almost overpower him on days when a crowd visits the capitol, and yet he saved the day at Gettysburg, and fell with three wounds while leading a forlorn hope at Petersburg. McDowell is on the retired list; Don Charles Buell runs an iron furnace in Kentucky; Banks is a United States Marshal; Hancock, Schofield and Pope are still Major Generals, but the last of them will retire in three years. General Terry is the youngest of the Brigadiers who won fame in the war. With good luck, he will succeed Sheridan in command of the army. General Wright, with benevolent face and patriarchal beard, has turned from war to projects of river and harbor improvements. Gilmore, Parks and Weitzel, once commanding corps and armies, are now in charge of lighthouses and fortifications. Grierson, the famous cavalry general of the Western armies, is broiling in Texas with the mounted colored regiment which he commands. They are all getting on toward the downward track. In ten years there will not be a general officer of the war in active life."

A TREMENDOUS TRAMP.

A St Louisan Who Traveled on Foot from New York to St. Petersburg.

At a recent meeting of the St. Louis Historical Society, the subject under discussion was the adventures of Russell Farnum, who was identified with the early history of St. Louis and the Northwest. He was a man about whom many newspaper items have been written, but of whose career little definite is known, especially his trip overland via Behring's straits from the United States, through Siberia, Russia, and thence to Paris, London and back to New York, in the interest of John Jacob Astor, who was at the time head of a fur company doing business on the upper Mississippi and Hudson's bay. The following extracts are taken from Elihu Shepard's History of St. Louis and Missouri.

"Col. Russell Farnum, a native of New Hampshire, had been a clerk in the employ of John Jacob Astor of New York for a time, and was dispatched by him to visit his employers and agents in the Indian county of the west, and with the aid of the late Wilson P. Hunt, to transact business as his agent, as his business and interests required. Farnum soon became well known in St. Louis, and at the commencement of the war in 1812 with Great Britain was on a business excursion near Lake of the Woods. Having finished his business, as fall approached he struck bodily across the country for Prairie du Chien. When he reached the river at that point, he was arrested by a United States officer and a party of soldiers as a British spy, and broguht to St. Louis under degrading circumstances; but when he arrived, the boat was surrounded by a crowd of his excited friends, and he was taken to his old quarters before the officer could secure the boat. The officer was greatly mortified at his conduct toward his prisoner when he learned who Farnum was, and returned his journal and other papers at once.

"After consultation with his friends, Gen. Clarke and Mr. Hunt, Farnum started alone with his dog and gun to carry messages to trading posts up the Missouri river and at Astoria on the Pacific coast. The exact date of his departure and arrival in different points of his long journey were carefully noted by him, as well as the remarkable incidents and observations on the route in a well-kept journal prepared for publication and was in the hands of a publisher of New York, who failed and died several years before Col. Farnum, and he was never after able to recover the journal or learn its fate.

"Having at length overcome the great barrier between the oceans, he reached the waters of the Columbia, and leaving the inbound rivers behind, meditated taking a more easy and speedy mode of traveling to complete his journey. But while he sat on a log near the river, mediting the best means of accomplishing his object, his dog, lying at a little distance, jumped up, and running between his legs, manifested great alarm, when Col. Farnum, turning his eyes to the river, saw five canoes filled with Indians glide by like an arrow. Their hostile appearance determined him to continue his journey in the same safe way in which he had accomplished the most difficult and dangerous part of it in safety, and in pursuance of this resolution, he reached Astoria in perfect health and delivered his dispatches in safety. When Col. Farnum had sufficiently recuperated to justify a further effort, he undertook the overland journey to St. Petersburg, Russia, taking with him documents for the Hudson Bay company. He walked up the Pacific coast to Kamskatka, still carrying his gun and accompanied by his dog, and arrived at Behring's strait in the winter of 1813-14 and crossed it on the ice. Entering Siberia, he proceeded across the eastern continent to St. Petersburg, where, introducing himself to the American consul at the Russian court, he was presented to Emperor Alexander as the bold American who had traveled by land across both continents. He was received with great consideration and kindness and was forwarded, without solicitation, as far as Paris on his homeward journey. * * * He was received in St. Louis on his return with great demonstrations. * * In 1820 Col. Farnum married the second daughter of Charles Bosseren. She survived him but a few years, leaving an infant son, who lived to the age of 18 and died of pulmonary disease. He died of cholera in 1832, never having rewritten his journal. * * His sudden death leaves only his friends to write of his adventures from recollection, without the aid of relations or documents of any kind except the public journals of that day."

OUR BEAUTIFUL WOMEN.

Fashion Lost Blonde and Brunette Loveliness.

In Paris, more than in New York or any other great city, there is a decided fashion in beauty as well as in dress, which changes as regularly as do the seasons, and which sometimes takes very queer and curious freaks. For instance, last spring the type of beauty that was all the rage was termed the "Daniel Gabrie. Rossett style." This type of beauty is assuredly one of the most peculiar known. It was originated by the Princess de Sagan, who is a great leader of fashion in Paris, and who appeared in her box at the opera one evening gotten up in the wonderfully striking "Daniel Gabriel Rossetti style." The most noticeble feature of this style of beauty is the hair, which is dyed green and arranged in a pyramid fashion on the top of the head. Strange to say, the green hair, though, of course, unnatural, is very pretty and odd. It is dyed the most delicate and lovely shade of green known, namely Nile Green. The complexion that goes with this hair must be like a soft, slightly blushing peach, all cream and white. The oyes are black or brown, the lips their natural color, and the eyebrows dyed to match the hair. Floating gowns, white in color, and composed of airy, fairy tuelle, are always worn with this type of beauty. Every woman in Paris has the mania for appearing like a "Daniel Gabriel Rosetti beauty" for awhile, but at present in Paris, which, by the way, Victor Hugo calls the "center of civilization," green hair reigns no more, and Dame Fashion dictates that her daughters shall now appear as in many different styles of beauty as is possible, believing no doubt, that "variety is the spice of life."

In New York, for the past two seasons, there has been great rivalry existing between the loving blonde and darling brunette beauties. The war still rages furiously, and it is hard to tell at the present moment which is to come out victorious, and whether the blonde beauties or their darker sisters will lead fashions this winter, and which will be the more popular. We do not often see in one metropolis as many real blondes and as many true brunettes as we have in New York. A real blonde has light hair with streaks of gold through it, eyes that look like wild violets complexion rare and white, with a delicate flush on the cheek and light eyebrows the color of the hair. True blondes never have dark eyebrows.

Although almost every lady knows what is requisite to be a true brunette, there are still a few who are not even educated up to it, and who call a woman who has a dark, clear skin "cheeks like roses and lips like the cherry," hair purplish black, and dark gray eyes, a brunette. No woman is a true brunette who has not very brown or very black eyes.

What is known as the "Irish type" of beauty is one of the loveliest. No eye is so blue, so large, so expressive, or so heavily fringed as that of the possessor of this type; no complexion so rosy and healthful, and to people in general this type is bewitching and fascinating.

The daughters of Spain and Italy are the best examples of the brunette type of beauty; those of England and Germany of the blonde type.

America is a mixture of all types, as a mixture of all nations. The true American type of beauty has hair soft and brown, eyes of gray or blue, complexion rather white, clear, and devoid of rich color, and features not by any means as regular as those of other types of beauty, but possessing far more expression.

Artemus Ward's Programme.

We have before us a relic of Artemus Ward. It is one of the programmes of his "Among the Mormons" entertainment, dated Sandusky, May 8 (probably 1864), We copy a few specimens: "The music on the grand piano will comprise, "Dear mother, I have come home to die by request," etc. "Washoe, the Land of silver—Good quarters to be found there. Playful population, fond of high-low-jack and homicide." "Heber C. Kimball's Harem—Mr. Kimball is a kind husband and numerous father." "Selections from the Grand Piano—Mr. Forrester. Mr. Forrester once boarded in the same street with Gottschalk. The man who kept the boarding-house remembers it." 'Those of the audience who do not feel offended with Artemus Ward are cordially invited to call upon him often, at his fine new house in Chicago. His house is on the right-hand side as you cross the ferry, and may be easily distinguished from the other houses by its having a cupola and mortgage on it." "Answers to correspondents: Laura Matilda—'I have an unfortunate tendency, even on trivial occasions, to shed tears. How can I prevent it?' 'Lock up the shed.'" "Traveller—'How long was Artemus Ward in California?' 'Five foot ten and a half.'" "Citizen—I am getting bald. What will make my hair come out?' 'Oil of vitrol will make all your hair come out.'" "Rules of the house: Ladies or gentlemen will please report any negligence or disobedience on the part of the lecturer. Artemus Ward will not be responsible for money, jewelry, or valuables, unless left with him—to be returned in a week or so. Persons who think they will enjoy themselves more by leaving the hall early in the evening, are requested to do so with as little noise as possible."—Cleveland Plaindealer.

A New Yorker Slays His Wife's Paramour.

Batavia, N. Y. is greatly excited over the murder of Johnson L. Lynch, a lawyer of Utica, N. Y., by Rowell a paper-box manufacturer. On Wednesday last Mrs. Rowell wrote to Lynch, saying that her husband was going to be away from home this week and asking him to visit her. Wednesday Rowell packed a valise and told his wife that he was going away. In the evening Lynch came to Batavia and proceeded at once to the Rowell house, where he had supper. After supper he and Mrs. Rowell repaired to a chamber and retired. Shortly afterward the room door flew open and Rowell dashed in, revolver in hand. He discharged his weapon once, and Lynch sprang from the bed and rushed down stairs, followed by Rowell, who fired three shots, Lynch falling to the floor at the foot of the stairs, dead. Mrs. Rowell followed and cried for help, Rowell standing near, upbraiding her for her infidelity. Rowell was at once arrested and lodged in jail. Lynch was twenty years of age, and Mrs. Rowell twenty-seven, and the mother of two children.

Personal Gossip.

Mr. Nathaniel Barker, author of "Ben Bolt," a well-known vocalist, is lying seriously ill at his residence on Western avenue, Lynn. He is about 70 years of age, and sustained a few days ago a fracture of his hip, which adds to his critical condition.

Mr. Blaine gets from the publishers of his new book $75,000 cash down and a royalty of fifteen cents a volume. There are advance orders for one hundred thousand copies, and it is expected that fully three hundred thousand will be sold. This would yield the author $120,000 in all which is somewhat more money than the average writer of books gets.

Mrs. Hymus Eastman, of Leon, N. Y. is now her own mother-in-law, having just married her deceased husband's father, who is 72 years of age.

Hon. James Russell Lowell, American minister at London, is reported to be a candidate for the rectorship of St. Andrews, Edinburgh, university.

It now appears that the wedding of Miss Rebecca Williams, of Baltimore, to Henry A. Herbert, member of the British parliament, which was to have occurred last Wednesday, was unexpectedly postponed, owing to the fact that Mr. Herbert wished to control the bird's fortune, $300,000, to which her father objected. It was the money, and not the maid, the fellow was after.

Immediately after the president's call for troops, James V. Guthrie, a resident of Covington, Ky., and W. E. Woodruff, major commanding the Marion Rifles, of Louisville, offered their services to the president, and asked authority to raise two regiments, as a part of the quota of their state. The authority was given on the 23d of April. Their camp was established on the north bank of the Ohio river just above Cincinnati, and was designated "Camp Clay."

The Rev. Newman Hall is universally known in England as the author of the tract "Come to Jesus." Some time ago, it is related, he wrote a reply to some of his critics, and, having a good deal of "the old men Adam" in his natural make-up, used some pretty stinging language therein. Before publishing it he read it to his friend, the late Dr. Binney, and then said: "Now, Doctor, I'm going to print it in tract form, and I want you to suggest a name for it." "Well," said the other, "while you were reading some of those hard hits at your enemies, it occurred to me that you ought to call it "Go to the Devil; by the author of "Come to Jesus." Mr. Hall saw the point, and didn't publish the tract at all.

A singular suit was brought before Judge Baxter, of the United States circuit court, in session in Nashville, Tenn. It was nothing less than the effort of Alice Marguerite King to defend her beauty against the assault of the Daily American. Miss King has figured as an actress, and the American said that she was a small woman with a pug nose, and ugly. She claimed $50,000 damages, but her suit was dismissed.

The New York Hour remarks: "The accident to Mr. Vanderbilt excites precious little sympathy for him. Everybody says: 'Serve him right; he never will observe the rule of the road.' For a man who has so much to do with horses, Mr. Vanderbilt is surprisingly ignorant of horse matters and driving. It is a standing joke among roadmen that on the day his team made the phenomimal record, they simply ran away with him."

Mrs. Oliphant says in the November Century, where she writes of Queen Victoria: "We hold it one of the most absurd of poetical fallacies that 'love' in the ordinary sense of the word is woman's whole existence,' yet it is very true that the history of a woman is chiefly the history of her affections and the close relationships in which her dearest interests are always concentrated. It is true also of a man that in these lie the real records of his happiness or misery; but there is more of the external in his life."

Lending Books.

"To lend or not to lend," is the first question which the book-lover has to propound to himself, and for which he seeks vainly an answer. If he does not lend the book which another needs and cannot easily get elsewhere he is a dog in the manger. If he does lend, and the precious tome never more returns, why the fool and his book are soon parted. If he tries to get wisdom by consulting the records of the past, he soon gets confusion only. Some great men and many little men have lent their books freely and frequently. Most of the great book-lovers—those who adore books as books—have rigidly refused to part with any of the volumes from their treasure-houses, guarding them as jealously as the Turk his harem; some have even gone to the extreme of letting no profane eye fall within the sacred depths of the bookcase. Carlyle was one of the great men of our scribbling century, and he was free with his books. When Dickens wanted to get up the facts for the framework of "A Tale of Two Cities," he consulted Carlyle as to the chief books he should read to master the feelings and the sayings and doings of the period. While he was expecting an answer, a cart drove up before his house, full of books about the French revolution; and Carlyle had sent it.

Chinese Courtesy.

A young mandarin attached to the Chinese embassy in Paris was one evening introduced to a beautiful and elegant woman. The lady being curious to know whether it was worth any one's while to attempt a little flirtation with this son of the Celestial empire, asked him among other things, what qualities his countrymen valued most in women. "Her domestic virtues," was the reply. "Oh, indeed!" said the lady, in a slightly contemptuous tone. "Then they don't like your ladies to go into company and enjoy a little gossip?" "No, madame, a Chinese husband has the right to get a divorce from his wife if she is a great talker." The charming French woman here thought she detected a covert allusion to herself and sarcastically inquired: "I suppose that would have been my fate in China?" The Chinaman was equal to the occasion and at once replied, bowing low: "You may be sure that from the day of your arrival in China the law that inflicts this mode of punishment on the loquacity of women would be abolished.

OSTRICH FARM IN FLORIDA.

An Experiment to Be Made with Three Pairs of the Birds.

The stock for the first ostrich farm in the United States was shipped from this city yesterday. It consisted of three pairs of 3-year-old ostriches. The destination of the birds was Sylvan Lake, Orange county, Fla., the mode of conveyance the Mallory Line steamer Western Texas. The birds shipped weighed from 150 to 200 pounds each, and stood about seven feet high without any stockings. They are natives of Nubia, in Upper Africa, and were captured while young by the agents of Charles Rieche & Brother, of this city and Hoboken, who are part projectors of the proposed ostrich farm. It took eight months to transport safely the birds from Nubia to this city. They reached here on Sept. 2, and for the past six weeks have been reveling in a diet of fine quality of hay, and a delicious mash of bran, oats, and cracked corn, in the wilds of the Reiches' wild animal farm at Hoboken. Notwithstanding their cordial reception and princely treatment they were a discourged and disheartened set of birds when they set out on their voyage to the sunny South. Their plumage was very much rumpled and broken, and they seemed to pine for one square meal of the sands of the desert. The attendants assert that the plumage was due to the accidents and incidents of their long voyage rather than a yearning for sand as a steady diet and the exhibition of deplorable bad taste in the rejection of Hoboken tomato-cans and broken glassware as a substitute.

Mr. Charlton James will be the guardian of the flock on their arrival in Florida. He has set apart 100 acres of his 500 acre farm for the purposes of this experiment in farming. The land forms a peninsula extending into the lake which gives the town its name. This has been inclosed to keep out alligaters and other enemies of the ostrich race. A pen has been provided as a home for the strangers, and they will be treated to more of the hay and mash diet until they shall have become well enough acquainted with their new quarters to be able to shift for themselves. Their first crop of feathers will be due next year, after they have moulted their present wholly unremarkable coat and got to work at the feather business in earnest. A year later, or when 5 years old, they are expected to be able to furnish two crops annually and begin the raising of families. The result of this experiment will be watched with much interest by scientific and business men, as its success would open up a new and remunerative field for enterprising business men.—New York Times.

Traveling in Spain.

The real Spain is the least attractive country in Europe to the tourist. The traveler goes there to see certain unique objects. He sees them, enjoys them, is entranced by them, leaves them with regret and tender memory, and is glad to get out of Spain. There are six things to see: the Alhambra, the Seville cathedral and Alcazar the Mosque of Cordova, Toledo and its cathedral, the Gallery of Madrid, and Monserrat. The rest is mainly monotony and weariness With the exception of the Alhambra, which has a spell that an idle man finds hard to break, and where perhaps he could be content indefinitely, there is no place like Spain that one can imagine he would like to live in, for the pleasure of living. Taking out certain historical features and monuments, the towns repeat each other in their attractions and their disagreeables. Every town and city in Italy has its individual character and special charm. To go from one to another is always to change the scene and the delight. This is true of the old German towns also. Each has a character. The traveler sees many a place in each country where he thinks he could stay on from month to month, with a growing home-like feeling. I think there is nothing of this attraction in Spain. The want of it may be due to the country itself, or to the people. I fancy that with its vast arid plains, treeless, and tiresome, its gullied hills and its bare escaped mountains, Spain resembles New Mexico. It is an unsoftened, unrelieved landscape, for the most part, sometimes grand in its vastness and sweep but rugged and unadorned. The want of grass and gentle verdure is a serious drawback to the pleasure of the eye, not compensated by the magic tricks of the sunlight, and the variegated reds, browns, and yellows of the exposed soil and rocks, and the spring-time green of the nascent crops. I speak, of course, of the general aspect, for the mountain regions are rich in wild-flowers, and the cultivation in the towns is everywhere a redeeming feature.

The traveler, of course, gets his impressions of a people from the outside. These are correct so far as they go, and it is in sense safe to generalize on them, though not to particularize. He catches very soon the moral atmosphere of a strange land, and knows whether it is agreeable or otherwise, whether the people seem pleasant or the reverse. He learns to discriminate for example, between the calculated gemuthlichkeit of Switzerland and the more spontaneous, friendliness of Bavaria. He can pronounce once upon the cordial good humor of the Viennese, the obligingness of the people of Edinburgh, the agreeableness of the Swedes, simple on street knowledge, without ever entering a private house or receiving any personal hospitality. He knows the wily, poetical ways by which he is beguiled in Italy, but grows fond of the sunny race.

In Spain he is pretty certain to be rubbed the wrong way most of the time. He is conscious of an atmosphere of suspicion, of distrust, of contempt often. He cannot understand, for instance, why attendants in churches and cathedrals are so curt and disobliging, keeping him away on one pretense or another, from the sights he has come far to see, and for which he is willing to pay. Incidents occurred both at Granada and Toledo that could only be accounted for only on the supposition that the custodians like to discommode strangers. If we had been Frenchmen, whom the Spaniards hate as the dispoilers of churches and galleries, we could have understood it. By reputation the Spaniard is at home hospitable, and on acquaintance gracious, and generally willing to oblige. But the national atmosphere is certainly not what the Germans call gemuthlich. In no other European country is the traveler likely to encounter so much incivility and rudeness, so little attempt at pleasing him and making him like the country. At least the attitude is that of indifference whether the country pleases him or not. Perhaps this springs from a noble pride and superiority. Perhaps it is from a provincial consciousness of being about 200 years behind the age. But, elsewhere the pleasantest people to travel among are those whose clocks stopped two centuries ago. Individually, I have no doubt, the Spaniards are charming. Collectively, they do not appear to welcome a stranger, or put themselves out to make his sojourn agreeable.—Charles Dudley Warner in November Atlantic.

Say, Hello, There!

"I want to ask you if Dr. Thomas' Eclectric Oil will really cure deafness, as is claimed in the newspapers?" "Well, you need not take our word as to that; write to J. J. Kline, Ashley, Luzerne county, Pa. See what he says. He took the pains to tell us the other day that his sister-in-law was cured of defective hearing by Dr. Thomas' Eclectric Oil, and that he was using it for the same purpose to vary perceptible advantage."

"Well, that's all right, as far as it goes, but I want more proof. Have you got any?"

"A plenty, sir. There is Rev. Mr. Crane of Dunkirk, N. Y., free from all prejudice, pro. or con., and as honest as the day is long. He says: 'For deafness and earache Dr. Thomas' Eclectric Oil has done wonders to my certain knowledge.'"

"You blow and brag a good deal about its being such a splendid remedy for catarrh. It's easy enough to say these things. Who has been cured of catarrh by Dr. Thomas' Eclectric Oil.

"Victor A. Lotter, editor National Record, Dansville, Pa., says: 'For catarrh it has helped me wonderfully.' George H. Dart, Sac City, Iowa, similarly afflicted, says, Thomas' Eclectric Oil relieved me the first dose.'"

"Hold on! That will do. That's evidence enough for me. What else is Dr. Thomas' Eclectric Oil good for?"

"There isn't a better medicine in the world for rheumatism and neralgia; and for any kind of an ache, pain or soreness it is matchless."

Everyone a Good Doctor.

Pliny says, everyone is a good doctor to himself if he be capable of looking closely into himself, for he can then see that his system needs rejuvenation, and that Allen's Iron Tonic Bitters is a sovereign remedy for the ills he suffers. All genuine bear the signature of J. P. Allen, St. Paul, Minn.

The Conductor.

Conductor Warren, of Winona, Minn., says, I used one bottle of Warner's White Wine of Tar Syrup, when I was so hoarse I could not speak above a whisper, and in twenty-four hours it cured me. It is the best remedy I ever saw.

Since last October I have suffered from acute inflammation in my nose and head—often in the night having to get up and inhale salt and water for relief. My eye has been, for a week at a time, so I could not see. I have used no end of remedies, also employed a doctor, who said it was impure blood—but I got no help. I used Ely's Cream Balm on the recommendation of a friend. I was faithless, but in a few days was cured. My nose now, and also my eye is well. It is wonderful how quick it helped me. Mrs. George S. Judson, Hartford, Conn. (Easy to use. Price 50 cts.)

I have taken Swift's Specific (S. S. S.) for rheumatism, and found perfect relief. It is the best tonic and Blood Remedy known to science. D. P. Hill, Attorney at law, Atlanta, Ga.

The good and staunch old stand-by, MEXICAN MUSTANG LINIMENT, has done more to assuage pain, relieve suffering, and save the lives of men and beasts than all other liniments put together. Why? Because the Mustang penetrates through skin and flesh to the very bone, driving out all pain and soreness and morbid secretions, and restoring the afflicted part to sound and supple health.

ALLEN'S
Lung Balsam!
A GOOD FAMILY REMEDY!
—THAT WILL CURE—
Coughs, Colds, Croup,
CONSUMPTION.

Dr. Meredith, Dentist, of Cincin'ti, was thought to be in the last stages of Consumption, and was induced by his friends to try Allen's Lung Balsam after the formula was shown him. We have his letter that it at once cured his cough and that he was able to resume his practice.

Jeremiah Wright, of Marion County, W. Va., writes us that his wife had Pulmonary Consumption and was pronounced incurable by their physician, when the use of Allen's Lung Balsam entirely cured her. He writes that he and his neighbors think it the best medicine in the world.

Wm. C. Digges, Merchant, of Bowling Green, Va., writes April 4, 1881, that he wants us to know that the Lung Balsam has cured his mother of Consumption, after the physician had given her up as incurable. He says others knowing her case have taken the Balsam and been cured. He thinks all so afflicted should give it a trial.

Wm. A. Graham & Co., Wholesale Druggists Zanesville, Ohio, write us of the cure of Mathias Freeman, a well-known citizen, who had been afflicted with Bronchitis in its worst form for twelve years. The Lung Balsam cured him as it has cured many others of Bronchitis.

Allen's Lung Balsam
Is harmless to the most delicate child!
It contains no Opium in any form!

ONE OF THE BEST
TESTIFIES.

I have been using Swift's Specific in my practice for quite a long time, and I regard it the best combination as a blood purifier and tonic. It is entirely vegetable, being composed of the extracts of roots which grow in this section of Georgia. I am familiar with its history from the time the formula was obtained from the Indians. It is a certian and safe remedy for all kinds of blood poison and skin humor, and there has never been a failure to cure. I have cured blood taint in with it, after I had most signally failed by the most approved methods of treatment with mercury and iodide of potassium.

THE MINISTER WHO FAILS to interest his congregation and build up his church is generally accused of being a poor preacher, or of not studying hard enough. That is not always where the trouble comes from. Dyspepsia and liver disorders are responsible for many a dull sermon and many a vacant pulpit. When the Dominie's digestive apparatus is working wrong and his nerves are giving him pain, and his brain refuses to do its duty, it is almost impossible to make or to preach a good sermon. Give your suffering minister a bottle of Brown's Iron Bitters. You will see its effect on next Sunday's preaching. The Rev. Mr. Zehring, of Codorus, Pa., was paralyzed, and could not walk except with crutches, until Brown's Iron Bitters made a new man of him. The Rev. Mr. White, of Rock Hill, S. C., says: "It restored me to strength and vigor." Brown's Iron Bitters is not only for the minister, but for all people.

HER PICTURE.

Sunlight falls on her pictured face,
Rimmed in a frame of gold;
The selfsame pose of a careless grace,
That I remember of old.
'Twas here we stood long years ago,
She in that pretty dress!
And I heard this syllable—sweet and low
From her rose-red mouth, 'twas—"Yes!"

So many years! And yet I'll swear—
Now, standing in this place—
I can smell the rose she hath in her hair,
While I look upon her face!
I feel the clasp of her slender hand,
Gentle, yet clinging fast,
And I almost feel I am young again,
Though so many years have past.

And yet, could I live over the space
Of those Indian summer days,
Bring back to my life this sweet fair face,
The canvas here portrays,
Were it wise to lose the peace that is mine,
For the restless hopes that have fled?
Not so; whatever is—is best.
"Let the dead past bury its dead!"

JUST A WILFUL GIRL.

"It is really too shabby; I ought not to wear it, had I? I ought to go."

"Dear, you look so pretty and so dainty in it, what can you say? I'm sorry, but—"

"O, well, if you like it; perhaps it's only that I have worn it so many times; the lace is mended in ever so many places; it's really such an old friend, Esther, that I am tired of it, and must get a new one somewhere."

"Tessey, Tessey, I can't bear to hear you talk like that, even in jest." The pale sweet face of the elder sister had grown paler still. There was a pained look in her soft eyes, and her breath came quick. If you want a new dress there is some money, some silver laid away in the box there—but we can get along—and you must use it."

She stopped; it seemed that the crowding tears would not let her go further Her voice gave out.

"Esther"—and that pretty young girl took that pale, quivering face in her two slim hands—"you thought I was in earnest? You thought I could take that money? You could think so badly as that of me? No, I will never joke again. I will always be in dead earnest. I have noticed before now that I get into a great deal of trouble because of my foolish habit of joking, And now—now kiss me."

Was not that sad-faced, gentle lady, with the tears not yet quite vanished from her own eyes, proud to touch with a soft caress the round cheek turned so prettily towards her?

"You know your pretty way of joking makes one of my greatest pleasures," she said: "and I am a foolish old woman; but if you want the dress—"

"Willst du mir nicht einen kuss geben?" called a clear voice from the open window. Both women turned; a pleasant face, blonde, with a blonde beard, and pleasant blue eyes, smiling from under thick waves of curling fair hair, was peering in at them.

"O, Joseph, is it you?" two voices spoke together. This smiling apparition, Mr. Joseph Muller, held out a dewy knot of flowers; all green leaves, white buds and tiny tendrils. Their exquisite fragrance filled the room.

"It is my contribution," he said, flushing behind the curtain that he pushed back with one hand. "I got them as I came along at Floyd's."

"Ah! ah! how beautiful! How can we thank you, Joseph? O, why was not I born a flower, just a white rose like this? Then I should not have to trouble about a new dress. Now, Miss Esther Payne!"

The blue eyes of the young man had been from the first fixed on this slim, fair flower-bud of a girl, who was hovering over his gift in an ecstacy of delight, The eyes flashed now with pleasure, as she took a spary of buds from the bunch and turned to her sister.

"You may put these right there, if you please—there in that bunch of curls over my forehead—so; that improves the matter."

"She had been fretting about her dress," explained Miss Payne to the young man in the window.

"Her dress? Why, what is the matter with it?" he asked, opening his eyes wide.

"It is old, and it is old-fashioned, and it is ugly," ejaculated Tessey, with emphasis.

"Why, I was just thinking how pretty it is, and I wondered if you had made it new for the occasion," remarked the stupid young man. "All that green color with the white, just like an apple and a bud, I thought you must be a flower-bud yourself unfolding."

Miss Payne smiled, but Therese made a face.

"The lace is mended all over; but then, it's real lace—real Mechlin," she observed, bewildering her masculine admirer with grave technicalities.

Happily he only saw the face, the brown hair ruffling on the forehead, the lovely eyes that laughed at him; the low, sweet voice that patronized him.

"O Blume, weisse, Blume!" he repeated, rapturously.

"Please don,t talk in that awkward German," cried out Tessey, pettishly. "It only makes me think of my school lessons, and I can't understand it, either. How can I tell whether you are laughing at me or paying me a compliment."

The young man laughed. "O Blume!" he repeated—"O flower! I was paying you a compliment; a just tribute."

"And, the other—when you first came?"

Joseph blushed and fidgeted.

"That—O, that was just nonsense; I must ask you to pardon it," he stammered.

The grave, soft eyes of Miss Payne looked at him as if she would say she had no fear he would there say to them that would be displeasing. She glanced at his dress and then said doubtfully.

"Were you gowing to the park—were you on your way?"

Joseph shrugg ed his shoulders, smilingly.

"I shall go presently. But I shall wait till the brass band and speechmaking are over. I don't wish to be deafened and disgusted at the same time."

Both of the women laughed at his unmistakable look of distaste. Therese nodded at him from over her shoulder; her little white hat, with its little bluebells and snow drops, making a shadow for her eyes to shine out of into his.

"O, querulous musician! I wonder that a young man who has such an ear for discord can't make better music of his own, especially when he is the owner of besides the cat, a genuine Paganini violin. There, I have got some of the Southernwood on me, and if they smell me in advance they will think a whole village Sunday School is coming. Good-bye, good-bye."

The two young people went away in opposite directions, and Mrs. Payne, left alone, sat for a long time in the little room in the lowering sunshine, silent, but not quite sad; at least her smile was stronger than her tears, and held its place on her placid mouth. For it was Tessey she was thinking of, the pretty, young, brown-haired maiden, between whom and utter loneliness and helplessness in a hard world only her own frail life and—Joseph. For Joseph loved the charming, home-sweet Tessey; Esther was sure of that. But Tessey! Ah! she was the "weisse Blume," truly—the white flower about which the swan might circle, singing its plaintive song till it should die.

"I wish—O, I wish,"—and Esther clasped her hands together with a nervous force—"I wish Tessey could love him. I could die happy, then."

The large tears rose and fell.

"Surely a girl's heart is not hard to win—if one knows the way."

And the trouble was that Joseph did not "know the way." He was good, he was gentle and kind; he would flush and stammer when the merry little maid asked him but to do something for her; then he would rush and stumble over his own feet a dozen times in the effort to obey her—and Tessey would laugh at him.

"Willst du mir nicht einen kuss geben?" "I think," said Esther to herself—"I think if Joseph would say that to her some day in earnest, and claim the kiss and take it as his right, he might win my little Therese."

But just here the trouble was. Joseph was afraid. His great love for the pure young girl, the "white flower" of his song, made him a coward; but it was a noble cowardice, and might go far to help him some day to high heroic deeds.

It was late when Tessey returned. Miss Payne had been sitting gloomily alone in the room where shaded lamplight and flooding moonlight, pouring through open window and door, made the place a bower of golden dust.

Tossing aside her hat and little white shawl, Tessey flung herself on the floor at her sister's feet. Esther placed a loving hand on the soft, brown, curling love-locks veiling that bright head.

"Did you have a happy day, my Tessey?"

"Oh, yes," was the answer, given with magnificent indifference.

"And—was Joseph there?"

"Joseph—you mean old Joseph, the band-master—of course he was there? How could there be a brass band without old Joseph to lead it?" replied again Miss Tessey.

Miss Esther touched with a finger of gentle reproof the naughty lips of the naughty speaker.

"Did you think I should inquire after such a person as that?"

"O, then you mean your friend Joseph—the one who makes quotations in German to show that he is learned. Yes, certainly he was there, but I did not see very much of him."

"But why?" And now Miss Payne's face grew grave; her voice fell. "But why, my Tessey? Surely—"

"O, I don't know." Tessey stretched up two tender white hands, clasping them indolently above her head. "You see, Esther, when he first made his appearance on the scene we had left the grounds. Most of our girls were in the big pavilion, getting our tea at the tables. And that horrid Melly Marchmont was there, and Joseph stopped at her table and stayed there a long time."

"Well, what then?" Tessey had paused in her recital, and was lying half kneeling, her soft flushed cheek, resting on her sister's arm. She smiled a little gravely when Esther spoke.

"What then? O, nothing but this; first I suppose I should not have minded it, but I got a hateful fancy that it was only because of her dress that he lingered by her; that he was ashamed to be seen with me."

"Tessey!"

"O, I know it was mean of me; but she was beautifully dressed. She is dark, you know—dark; and she was all in dark tissue, with broad bands of gold on her arms and waist and in her hair. It was very becoming to her, and I suppose Joseph paid her compliments in German."

"Child!" and Miss Payne pinched with a smile the little pearl-pink ear.

"Well, at all events, he couldn't call her his 'weisse Blume'—his white flower—could he?" quoth Miss Therese, triumphantly. She sat up and rested her chin on her arm to begin again.

"And so when he last began to make his way across—meaning to speak to me—I was engaged to dance with Harry Wistar. I really hadn't time to waste on Joseph. They—the other Joseph was playing my favorite music."

The witch stopped and began to hum one of Gouod's delicious airs.

"And I really didn't see him."

"O, Tessey! how could you do so!—and Joseph is so kind." There were tears ready to break the tremble of Esther's pained voice.

"Kind!" broke in Miss Tessey, indignantly, "I don't know what your ideas are; but I call it far from kind to snub me so. And, after all, I don'th think he would have minded it so much—so very much—but a slight shower came up while we were dancing, and we all rushed back to the pavillion."

Here Miss Tessey paused again. A dimpling smile stole into her round rosy cheek.

"There was a litle spot of marshy ground on the path, and the rain had made it worse. So when we came to that—you see I had on my light shoes—Henry threw down his coat and nothing to do but I should walk over it. And when I looked up just as we entered the pavilion, what an expression there was on Joseph's face! I do believe he was swearing to himself—in German."

Esther was silent, with a pained fear at her heart. What could she say? How could she chide this beautiful young creature who was so dear, so winsome, so worthy of love—of a good man's love? How could she help and not hurt?

"Well!" exclaimed Therese, authoritatively, growing tired of the silence.

"My dear," said Esther, timidly, "don't you think with me, that Mr. Wistar's attention was a little out of place; that it was—conspicuous?"

Miss Tessey vouchsafed no reply to this.

"I am tired and sleepy; I must go to bed," said, Tessey, suddenly getting up.

Then she glanced at Esther's face.

"Smile!" she commanded. "Do you think I am going to say good night to such eyes as those? Smile at once!"

The grieved look melted swiftly into tears, With loving arms twined around each other's neck, the two sisters cried silently. But their good-night kiss was the sweetest for those very tears.

In the quiet days that followed—perhaps because they were living nearer together—more in sympathy with each other—these two sisters noticed, Esther that Tessey was more than unusually silent, that under her joyous laugh shone the glimmer of crowding tears: but Tessey that Esther grew more thin and wan, that her strength seemed to be consumed as by some eating fire.

One evening, Esther, in her chair, drew Tessey to her. The young girl came and knelt by her side in the old familiar way, the pretty bronze-brown love-locks ruffling over her lap, the white arms softly upthrown.

"Dear," said the elder sister in a low voice, "you never sing to me now."

"No," answered Tessey, slowly, "It must be—I don't know why—unless—I don't think of it."

"You did not wait once to think of it, Tessey, you sang because you must."

"Yes, that does make a difference, to feel the music in one. When a bird is being cooked and eaten I suppose it does not feel like singing."

"What in the world do you mean, child?"

"Meant nothing; I never mean anything; that is why I get into so much trouble."

The girl spoke in a mocking way, but a moment later she began more seriously:

"Do you know, Esther, I was reading this morning the old story of the knightly lover who had a beautiful bird that his lady coveted. He was very poor, but he would not sell his bird. But one fine day the princess sent a message that she was coming to dine with him, and as he had nothing in his larder fit for so dainty a lady, he bade the cook kill the bird and serve it."

Here Tessey paused a moment, for a sound as of tears was in her voice. She put her hand over her eyes.

"It is such a tender story, Esther, I can't tell it as it ought to be told; but the young knight must have sat and looked at her—can't you fancy it?—while she sat at this table and ate his frugal dinner—and then—she said she would love him—be his own true princess—if he would give her his bird."

"Well," said Esther, smiling, "the princess did get the bird in one way if not in another. And I wonder if the young knight quite loved her when he saw her eating it!"

"O, you hard-hearted woman," cried Tessey. "But I thought of that, too."

Then rising with a quick change of manner she said: "I wonder if Joseph would contribute his beloved violin to make a fire for me if I were freezing."

Esther began to understand.

The next day Miss Payne was not so well. She was lying on the sofa in the little parlor, when Tessey came and knelt by her, and took her two hands. The girl had a strange, sad feeling, as if she were lost in a wood, with no one to show her the way out.

"I don't know what to do for you," she sobbed. "You are getting worse, Esther: what is it? Shall I send for some one! O, why does not Joseph———"

She stopped suddenly, but Esther heard, and the next day a message found its way to that young man, who answered in person.

He walked straight up to Esther's chair when he came in.

"I did not know you were ill," he he said; and oh the sense of comfort, of rest, that the invalid felt when she heard his voice—when she looked into his clear eyes. "Is it anything serious? I am sorry."

Esther smiled gently; but he grew grave with a startled fear when he saw the change in her.

"It is not painful - only a little troublesome; and I should not mind it so much but Tessey frets over me."

Joseph looked for the first time at Tessey, who was sitting apart by the window, She barely glanced up as she spoke, but there was a bright red flush in her cheek. And her eyes—how soft and appealing they were as they looked at him so briefly. Perhaps he had been unnecessarily harsh with her—just a slip of a girl, a white flower unfolding.

Presently Tessey slipped from the room.

"Come closer, Joseph," began Miss Payne, nervously clasping and unclasping her hands; "I have but a moment, and I wished to say to you—perhaps I am meddling—I am sick and have many fancies—but, Joseph, if I were a young man, loving a shy, half frightened girl, I should say to myself—I should always say to myself this truth: 'A faint heart never won fair lady.'"

Joseph looked at her; his face turned red and then white, and then he burst out into a curious, hysterical laugh.

"God bless you, Miss Payne. I believe you are the best woman in the world," he said, earnestly. He kissed her hand; how cold it was! how wan and sad and tired she looked! but—not a meddler; no.

When Joseph took his leave, as he walked along the hall he heard behind a door half open the notes of a piano and a low voice singing—Tessey's voice. Joseph hesitated a moment, then picking up courage, repeating to himself with a queer little smile the words, "faint heart never won fair lady," he pushed the door open and went in.

Tessey was there alone, playing and singing to herself. She jumped up when she saw who her visitor was.

"Stay," he said quickly; "I did not come to disturb you, I came to listen."

Tessey stopped and stood silent, with bent face.

"Won't you sing me one song?" he pleaded.

But Tessey turned away, and began to gather up her scattered music sheets.

"I can't sing in German," she answered, coldly "My songs are all simple ones. They are only English songs, not worth listening to."

He looked at her, hesitated a moment for the last time, then took a step forward.

"Why do you treat me in this cold way, Tessey?" he burst out. "Have I offended you in any way? What have I done?"

"You? No; it is nothing, only—only—"

And then it was all over, and Tessey was sobbing her grief and joy and resentment all out together on Joseph's shoulder.

He drew her thus close for a little space, and then drew her out at arm's length away from him.

"Willst du mur nicht einen kuss geben?" he said, laughing; and then Tessey lifted a flower-fair face and Joseph took his kiss.

"Libechen," he whispered tenderly; and oh, the beauty of that sweet old German word, as Joseph spoke it!

"Liebchen," shall we tell Esther now?" Then he looked at her more closely.

"And you must get on the beloved white dress. You must always wear it, O weisse Blume."

Tessey laughed. "Come to Esther now," she said.

But alas! Esther was asleep.

Our Times and Dead People's Times.

Is not ours a great improvement on the "good old times?" True, our newspapers are full of murders, burglaries, thefts and other crimes, but not one-tenth of these found their way into the papers in the old times. People could not realize the evil among them. Such realization is the first step to the cure. A man now can seldom be robbed and murdered without its being known throughout the length and breadth of the land. In the Dick Turpin days of England how many unknown crimes of the road must have been committed, when there was neither live paper, live reporter nor live telegrapher to make it known! Our papers to-day have a great deal to say about the corruptions of legislatures, states and national, and of abuses of those in power. Probably more or less truth is involved in such statements. What opportunity in any land had the rank and file of the people 200 years ago, to know about what went on in high places and governing bodies, save by word of mouth? Print such matter in a paper? Had there been a paper to print it and an editor daring enough to print it, he would not have seen twenty-four hours of liberty after the first issue. It is doubtful if ever he would be seen afterwards. Recollect that it is still less than 100 years since the time of the French cubliettes and lettres de cachet, when a man arrested by the government went out of sight forever.—San Francisco Chronicle.

SELECT MISCELLANY.

THE PRIMAL PAIR.

When Adam from his sleep awoke,
A radiant creature met his eyes,
Whose beauty on his vision broke
As breaks the morn 'neath tropic skies.
With wonder Adam stood transfixed—
Another day had just begun—
She crossed his vision just betwixt
The dawn and rising of the sun.
"Tis Morn," said he, "in human guise;
Fair Morn, my homage pray receive."
The vision blushed, cast down her eyes,
And said: "I am not Morn, but Eve."

"AUNT ESS."

Translated from Arnold Mortier.

I became acquainted with her at Amsterdam in the family of one of my friends. Everybody in the house used to call her "Aunt Ess". Her real name, I think, was either Esthelle or Esther. She was rapidly approaching 60; but her white hair was the only outward indication of her age. Her skin was delicate and unwrinkled, her eyes full of spirit, and she had superb teeth, which an almost ever-smiling mouth coquettishly displayed. She must have been once very pretty; she was still good-looking. And this persistent beauty was further accentuated by a really extraordinary animation of manner.

The brightness of her eyes, her quickness of expression, her rapid gesture, her pretty speech, her always hurried walk—all indicated that this charming sexegenarian, ever alert, obliging and busy, was devoted to some very active calling, and was thoroughly absorbed by the worry of business.

In fact Aunt Ess had "had been in business." Did I say she had been? She was still in business. In her family it was generally predicted that this indefatigable woman-worker would never find rest, would never be able to repose, For Aunt Ess was not a millionaire by any means.

Although she was really well established in business on her own account, she had always lived in poverty—independent poverty it is true, but absolute poverty nevertheless. She had never asked any favors from anybody. Even in order to induce her to take dinner with the family once in a fortnight, the most urgent solicitations were required. She used to come clad in a grey woolen dress—always the same dress winter or summer, with sleeves tight at the wrists, a long waist, and little flounces at the bottom. Then as a general rule, she would always bring some confectionery, for the children, would be very kind, very merry; and if anybody chanced to inquire about her affairs she would always reply that business was "tolerably good."

Nevertheless the business of Aunt Ess was not of colossal importance.

The poor woman lived in a regular cellar—one of those frightful Amsterdam cellars, damp, unhealthy, vertible nests of fever, wherein the visitor is astounded to find clean and pretty businesses established, fruit-booths, shoemakers' and coopers' shops, fishmongers' establishments, and even drinking halls. One had to go down a flight of about a dozen steps in order to reach her little stationery shop, not bigger than the cage of an æronaut. There was a little table there—a very little table—which served as a counter; three or four paste-board boxes full of reams of writing paper of different sizes; an old glove box in which steel pens, quill pens and bad pencils were all jumbled pellmell together; six ink jars and four rules. That was all. It would not have been hard to make an inventory of the stock. In her busy season Aunt Ess could make from 12 to 15 florins.

In the evening the little shop was transformed into a supper-room; at night into a sleeping-room. The counter was turned into a dining-room; and the bed was an armoire in the farther end of the cellar—an armoire with folding doors and only one shelf upon which a narrow mattress was placed.

It was in that underground place she lived; and she had lived there for forty years when I knew her. She lived honestly, loyally, never contracting one cent of debt, and nevertheless finding means to save up and treasure away enough money for her dowry.

For Aunt Ess was engaged—Aunt Ess had a betrothed.

It will be necessary, ere continuing this little narrative, to relate something about betrothals in Holland.

When the young Dutchman finds the young Dutch girl of his dreams, and the said Dutch girl has found the young Dutchman to her taste—the families of both having been duly consulted and give their consent—it is forthwith agreed that the twain shall remain betrothed for a year or two.

From that time forward the future husband and future wife live altogether for one another, just as though they already belonged to one another. They can come and go as they please. Or walk out together, without that chaperon who has become an apparently indispensable feature of our French social system. You can see the betrothed everywhere together—at the theatre, on the street, walking out for a day's recreation—lovingly leaning one upon another the future wife already under the protection of her future husband. Never has this preliminary intimacy shocked anybody; never has this prologue to marriage been aught else than a prologue.

One day when she was 18 years old, Aunt Ess introduced into her family the man whom she had honored with her affection, and who had solicited her hand.

A poor little shop-keeper like her!

But he was even poorer, and in business on a smaller scale; for Aunt Ess had a shop, a counter, paste board boxes full of reams of note paper, and an old glove box full of metalic pens—whereas the man of her choice had no shop at all.

Or if he could be said to have one, it was so small that he could carry it under his arm.

Karel was a dealer in cigars—but not one of those big speculators who filled their huge warehouses with fragrant stock imported directly from Havana. His whole stock-in-trade—a peddler's stock—consisted of a little box that had contained extra superfine regalias before it fell into his hands, and in which he displayed with astounding ostentation choice cigars at 2 cents apiece. He would offer those to the smallest retail dealers; never having more than a hundred cigars at a time, and seldom being able to get rid of them in less than fifteen days.

The calling could not certainly bring him in any more than what her intermittent sale of pencils, pens and letter paper brought into the purse of his betrothed.

Their engagement was thus effected under rarely well-balanced conditions.

It was a love match because they had mutually chosen each other through affection.

It was a strictly suitable match in view of the absolute equality of both parties in regard to fortune.

It was also a sensible match, as it had been agreed they were not to marry until they had each put by some money, so as to begin house-keeping without improvidence.

They were very particular about the last point.

Aunt Ess had formally announced that they would not marry until they had been able to accumulate between them the sum of a thousand florins. That was the least possible sum needed to rent a larger store—to combine the confectionery business with the tobacco and cigar trade—to secure better sleeping accomodation than an armoire, where, in fact, two could not possibly sleep—and to bring up properly a lot of babies who would take up a great deal, a very great deal of room.

So from the day she was betrothed to Karel, Aunt Ess—whom the neighbors had been wont to hear singing at the bottom of her cellar as merrily as a nightingale on the top of a poplar tree—Aunt Ess, whom all the quarter had unanimously declared to be inclined to giddiness—Aunt Ess became totally metamorphosed.

She suddenly became a hard person to deal with when it came to buying, and a sharp bargainer—greedy for money! Nothing could equal her business zeal, except the zeal and ardor of Karel.

But it was not so easy to make money after all. The larger dealers absorbed all the trade. The combined effort of the betrothed resulted in little or nothing. Then he tried to deal in higher priced cigars, while she ventured to speculate in the famous Bath paper, just imported from France. But this double commercial operation was doubly disastrous, and almost resulted in bankrupting the little underground stationery store and the puny cigar business, together with all the matrimonial hopes of the lovers.

"Let us not go so fast," they said to one another, terrified at their audacity; "let us leave speculations alone. We know what we have got. Wait! we'll pull through all right in time anyhow."

And they waited. They continued to live side by side, in that tender and discreet intimacy which their betrothal permitted—rich in love and richer in hope.

As for hope, indeed, their hearts were full to bursting with it. And they nursed illusions which nothing was ever able to destroy—and long-carressed projects for the future, eternal projects which they chatted about every evening over and over again—she sitting behind her counter, and he before it, gazing at her with ecstacy. Sometimes it was a bureau they had caught a glimpse of in a Kalverstraat store, and which they would buy for the bed-room the very day they should begin housekeeping; sometimes, again, they would discuss how the children should be brought up—he would like a daughter most, to begin with; she would prefer a son.

One evening she expressed a new whim.

"Dost thou know" [they always thee'd and thou'd each other]—"dost thou know what we must do? Thou wilt doubtless say I am foolish, yet I have my heart set upon it. We must buy between us a lottery ticket."

The Dutch government maintains a lottery, and derives a considerable revenue therefrom. The drawing is conducted by series of numbers, and is prolonged for several weeks. The capital prize of 160,000 florins is always drawn on the last day. Now the ticket which Aunt Ess bought bore a number which had not been drawn on the previous days, and therefore had a chance in the great and last chance.

Fancy for yourself how they must have been building castles-in-the-air for a few days before the drawing.

"If you see me coming in a carriage to-morrow night," said Karel to Aunt Ess, "then you may be sure our ticket has drawn the capital prize."

And next day Aunt Ess was at her door very early in the morning. How impatient she was. Every time she saw a carriage approaching her heart palpitated violently. Luckily there were but few carriages that day upon the Amsterdam quays. At last, however, her brain suddenly reeled. She felt that she had turned white as death. A vigilante (cab) had halted right before her door.

She caught a glimpse of Karel's head in the doorway. In one second all the projects nursed for so many long years rushed through her mind. It was hers at last, then—that happiness so earnestly prayed for. There could be no question about it; they had won in the lottery; for Karel was in a carriage. Then she ran to the door to the cab, which opened slowly. Karel's face was terribly agitated.

"What hast thou?" she asked, all trembling. "Is it the capital prize?"

"No," he replied; "but I have broken my leg."

She nursed him there, in her shop—gave up her armoire to him, and contented herself with sleeping on a chair. When he was fully restored again, he recommenced his cigar trade.

And thus it was that years and years passed by, that disillusions succeeded to disillusions, without ever breaking down their faith in a better future; and side by side they grew old, never perceiving that their brows were wrinkling—that she was 60—that he was 70, and that even their health was growing feebler and feebler.

Aunt Ess was very sick, but she said nothing about it to any one. She was dying with consumption, but mastered herself sufficiently to carry on her little business in some sort of fashion. After all, she suffered very little pain, never even dreamed of calling in a doctor.

One day, feeling herself weaker than usual, she retained her betrothed with her, although he had an order for twenty-five cigars to fill. They talked a great deal. Their eternal hopes seemed nearer of realization than ever. Indefatigable as ants, the two lovers had finally been able to lay some money by. They now needed only half the sum—that would only be the work of a few years.

While they were talking together the night came—a lukewarm autumn night. Aunt Ess was feeling very well.

"I have an idea!" she said. "See! we are old now, after all. It is very likely we shall have no children. Suppose we content ourselves with the little we have—to get married upon?"

He thought that was very reasonable. What was the use in fact of waiting any longer? Yes, yes! they would marry without delay. She had taken his hand in hers, pressed it with force—then she had closed her eyes.

"Well, then, it is settled," he said to her; "I will have everything arranged at once."

She did not answer him.

He went out on tiptoe, very softly, thinking her fast asleep.

She was dead.

When I returned to Amsterdam the last time I saw at my friend's house a tall and sorrowfully built old man, all clad in black.

It was Aunt Ess' betrothed.

The poor woman's relatives had taken care of him with kindly care and affectionate consolation. He is still one of the family circle.

HOUSE AND FARM.

The Grace of Courtesy.

Courtesy is a debt which we owe every one. To refuse to give it is as bad as stealing. We owe it to all; old or young, rich or poor, learned or unlearned. The true lady is a lady always. She has not two sets of manners. Her charwoman, laundress or market boy, are addressed with the same gentle tones of kindly feeling and courteous consideration that she bestows upon her friends in the parlor It was said of the Empress Eugenie by other European monarchs that it was evident she was "not born to the purple" as she was, upon her accession to the throne, too polite and attentive to some, and to cold and haughty to others. Kings and queens and people of high rank and real greatness or genius are always perfectly simple and unaffected in their manners without the least trace of haughtiness. It is said that when the friends of Washington expostulated with him for condescending to lift his hat to return the salute of a colored servant he said, "Shall I let him outdo me in politeness?"

Manners.

Young folks should be mannerly. How to be so is the question. Many a good boy and girl feel that they cannot behave to suit themselves in the presence of company. They feel timid, bashful and self-distrustful, the moment they are addressed by a stranger or appear in company. There is but one way to get over this feeling and acquire graceful and easy manners; that is to do the best they can all the time at home as well as abroad. Good manners are not learned from arbitrary teaching so much as acquired from habit. They grow upon us by use. We must be courteous, agreeable, civil, kind, gentlemanly, and womanly at home, and then it will soon become a kind of second nature to be so everywhere. A coarse, rough manner at home begets a habit of roughness, which we cannot lay off if we try, when we go among strangers. The most agreeable people we have ever known in company, are those that are perfectly agreeable at home. Home is the school for all the best things, especially for good manners.

Hard and Soft Water.

The hardness or softness of water says Professor Simpson, depends upon the amount of mineral ingredients which it contains. These mainly consist of carbonate and sulphate of lime, the former giving rise to what is called temporary hardness—it being for the most part removable by continued boiling, whereby it becomes incrusted as chalk on the inside of the vessel in which the water is boiled; and the latter to permanent hardness, because it is not thus removable. A very hard water is injurious for drinking purposes because its power as a solvent for food is impaired, and because it is absorbed by the stomach with greater difficulty than a soft water, thus giving rise to indigestion or dyspepsia. In addition to the long train of distressing symptoms which are included under the term dyspepsia, there is strong evidence to prove that the habitual drinking of very hard water also gives rise to goitre, a disease associated in many places with that fearful form of idiocy known as cretinism. In many parts of England goitre is found to prevail only in those districts where the magnesian limestone formation is abundant. In some districts in Switzerland the use of certain spring waters of unusual hardness has been followed by the production or argumentation of the disease in the course of a few days, and similar results have frequently been observed in India.

Cooking Recipes.

Meringue Pudding.—Soak one pint of bread crumbs in one quart of milk, add yolks of four eggs, well beaten, one cup of sugar, the rind and juice of one lemon and bake in an earthen pudding dish. When baked, pour over all an iceing made of the whites of fou reggs. Eat, when cold, with cream.

Egg Roll.—Allow one egg for each person, two cups of milk for thre eeggs, and four teaspoonfuls of flour. Beat the whites and yolks separately, and add the eggs last. Put a very little of the mixture into a hot frying pan well greased with butter, roll as you would an omelet, put on a platter, and send in hot for breakfast or tea. Can be eaten with sugar.

Old Fashioned Indian Pudding—Boil three quarts of milk in a farina kettle, take off the fire and turn it on to one pint of Indian meal, taking care not to lump in stirring; add a little more than one-half pint of molasses, one-half teaspoonful of salt, one-half teaspoonful of cinnamon, one tablespoonful of butter; return to farina kettle and boil ten minutes or until the Indian meal has thickened, stirring constantly. Have ready buttered earthen pudding pot, into which turn this mixture, add one pint of cold milk, stirring it in but two inches from the top of the pudding, do not stir any more after this, if you do it will destroy the whey. Bake three or four hours in a moderate oven. Use medium coarse Indian meal and dark molasses.

Risen Corn Bread.—When made after the following very popular and reliable recipe, it must be of good lively meal. Mix a tolerably stiff dough of corn meal and boiling water, a little salt, and a tablespoonful of butter. Let it stand four or five hours until light, make into small loaves (as you would wheat bread) and bake rather quickly.

Egg Bread.—This is one of the best of corn breads, and I append the recipe. Half a cup of bread crumbs soaked in a pint of milk, two eggs, two cups of corn meal, one tablespoonful of lard or butter, one teaspoonful of salt. Beat the eggs light, and the soaked bread crumbs to a batter, melt the shortening, stir all together very hard, and bake in shallow tins very quickly.

Agricultural Notes.

Good, clean stone jars are the best for packing butter in for winter use.

It is a good ton of sorghum, or northern cane that will make fifteen gallons of syrup.

Select the land that you are going to plant potatoes the next year. If it is in grass, top dress with manure, and let it lie until spring. Stubble should receive an application of manure, and then be turned under. If the ground is wet and you cannot afford to underdrain it, put it to some other use, but do not risk the potatoes on it.

Farmers should buy only from well known and respectable dealers, who value their reputation too much to sell grades for thoroughbreds.

The poultry breeders of Hammonton, N. J., have endeavored to settle the vexed question as to which breed of poultry is the best for general purposes. The Brahmas, Plymouth Rocks, Wyandottes, Leghorns, Longshans, and Houdans were experimented with, not only for egg production, but for market purposes. The Houdans and Wyandottes were too late in the trial, but the verdict of the majority of the breeders is in favor of the Langshans, which grow to a large size, lay very early and until late in the season rarely sit, and stand the climate well. The chicks of that breed grow very fast, are compact, and realize the highest prices.

The Use of Salt on Land.

The advantages, says an American paper, of using salt on land and in feeding all kinds of farming stock have often been discussed, and there is enough on record to satisfy the most incredulous and to stimulate progressive farmers most seduously to pursue agricultural tests of this substance in every way. The usefulness of salt in curing and promoting the health of our domestic animals has long been known in the United States. The ancient writers often allude to it. Pliny, the naturalist, seems to have known little or nothing of the use of salt in agriculture, but he was well aware of its virtue in feeding cattle "Herds of cattle," says he, "being covetous of a salt pasture, give a great deal more milk, and the same is much more agreeable in the making of cheese than where there is no rocky saline ground." John Glauber, an eminent chemist of Amsterdam, who published several esteemed works on the practice of chemistry about 250 years ago was so thoroughly convinced of the economy of using salt as a manure that he obtained a patent from the government of the United States of Holland, for the sole disposal of the privilege of applying this valuable mineral to the barren lands in that country. Gervase Markham, a noted writer in the reigns of James I. and Charles I., who was equally noted for his skill in many foreign languages and for his knowledge of the various branches of agriculture, published a great variety of treatises on the management of land, and closed his agricultural labors by the publication of a work entitled "Markham's Farewell to Husbandry," in which the following passage occurs: "If you be neer unto any part of the sea-coast, thence fetch great store of the salt sand, and with it cover your ground which hath been formerly plowed and backt, allowing unto every acre of ground threescore or fourscorefull bushels of sand, which is a very good and competent proportion; and this sand thus laid shall be very well spread and mixed among the other broken earth. And herein is to be noted that not any other sand but the salt is good or available for this purpose, because it is the brine and saltness of the same which breedeth this fertility and fruitfulnesse in the earth, choking the growth of all weeds, and giving strength, vigor and comfort to all kinds of grain of pulse, or any fruit of better nature."

Sir John Sinclair, one of the foremost agricultural writers of his own or any other age, advocated the use of salt for the three following reasons, First, that by allowing the sheep to lick it, the rot was effectually prevented; second, that his cattle, to whom lumps of it were given to lick, were thereby protected from infectious disorders, and the cows, being thus rendered more healthy, and being induced to take a greater quantity of liquid, gave more milk; and, third, that a small quantity pounded was found very beneficial to horses when new oats were given them, if the oats were at all moist.—Chambers' Journal.

SETTING PRECIOUS STONES

An Employment That Requires Dexterity and Taste—The Present Fashion.

From the New York Sun.

"Turquoise and pearl settings for jewelery will be much worn this season," a setter of precious stones said yesterday. "Diamonds and turquoise settings will also be worn, but not so much as the others. We are working now as hard as we can, for this is our busiest season. For the coming quarter we will employ nearly twice as many setters as we kept at work during the summer.

"Most of the setters are German. All that we have are German. There is a great difference in setters, and first-class men in this line are not as plentiful as they might be."

"How much can a first-clas setter earn?"

"We had a young man here not long ago to whom we paid $40 a week. There are not many, however, who make as much as that. Their wages vary with their ability. Their average pay is somewhere around $18 a week."

"Is the trade overrun with workmen?"

"Not particularly. Of course, some setters can always be found out of work during the dull season. When the rush comes pretty nearly all of them find employment. The setters can make more money than the workmen who make the rings. They only require to be quick and careful to get along. In making the settings they follow the samples which are before them. The workman who gets out the samples must have an artistic eye and be able to judge of effects."

"Who makes the samples generally?"

"The foreman of the shop. He is hired chiefly for this purpose, but he is not kept designing samples all the time. After the line of samples is completed the setters work at them until their run is over. Then new samples are got out. When an establishment gets hold of a good foreman it likes to keep him, and pays him a good salary."

The Great Medical Library.

Ford's theater, at Washington, where Lincoln was shot, has been turned over to the medical profession. There is little in it to remind one of the famous assassination. If you go there they will point you where Lincoln's box used to stand and will show you the second-story window out of which Booth jumped to get his horse and gallop away. If you are in high favor with your guide perhaps you may get to see about three inches of Booth's vertebræ, which are pickeled in alcohol. But these are all that will remind you that here was acted one of the greatest tragedies of history. But the medical collections are the finest in the United states, and the medical library is the largest in the world. It has 60,000 volumes, and more than 66,000 pamphlets. A catalogue of all the subjects and authors contained in these books is being prepared. It is to be comprised in ten volumes of 1,000 pages each; four volumes are already completed. They are quartos, printed as fine as a twenty-five cent bible, and each of them will weigh about as much as a big dictionary. They have been working on them for half a dozen years or more, and they have only got as far as F.

DEFECTIVE PAGE

AGAIN, THE MILLERS.

We are told that, last week, when there was a rise in wheat in eastern markets a farmer hauling wheat to an elevator in this city, was surprised that there was no corresponding rise here, and asked the buyer why there was no corresponding rise in this market. The buyer replied, "What's the use, if they gave you the rise of one cent per bushel they would

DOCK YOU ONE GRADE

to make it up so you had better be content with what you can get!" Think of that, farmers, and then figure up your chances for justice under this grinding monopoly. Think of it business men, and figure out—IF YOU CAN—how long it will take the farmers to pay up all they owe while under the complete control of this more than highway robber, the Minneapolis Millers Ring. WILL you stand such open robbery and not protest! Will you see your country plundered year after year, your business suffer as it does and not arise in your just wrath and demand an open market or some change that will give you relief? Farmers, you knew that the profits upon your wheat, which should go to pay your debts, to provide warm, comfortable clothing and food for your little ones during the coming long, cold winter and goes to enrich the members of this soulless corporation. Business men, you know that that money the wheat-raiser owes you for supplies while he was raising that crop

IS STOLEN FROM YOU,

WAS STOLEN FROM HIM

and goes outside of your city and county to enrich a soulless corporation whose octopus grip is upon the vitals of this country, sqeezing its life-blood out. We have endured this thing long enough, hoping for a change which so far from coming

GROWS WORSE EVERY YEAR.

Under one pretext and another, "soft wheat," "damp wheat," "smutty wheat," "frozen wheat," they have applied the screws until this fall, when we have as fine a crop of No. 1 Hard as ever grew, almost every bushel of which is well worth one dollar, we are only getting an average of a paltry per bushel. We say that at least 95 per cent. of our Scotch Fife wheat this fall should grade No. 1 Hard, which is actually worth one dollar. Even upon the market that the thieving ring allows it is worth now 80 cents which is a clean steal of

SIXTY-FIVE CENTS

of No. 1 Hard right here in their own market. This is done by what they (probably) call "grading." When they fix the market so that the average price is sixty-five cents per bushel on all the grain we shall send out this year, it does not take a very deep mathmetician to figure out the total amount of the steal that goes out of the pockets of business men and the farmers, out of the county, to enrich this thieving ring. The hand of Providence relieved our neighbors at Angus (their elevator took fire and burned to the ground) of the octopus grip of the Millers Association and the result is that the dwellers about Angus have received from fifteen to twenty cents more per bushel for their wheat than at any place where there is an elevator, simply because they could ship where they chose and have shipped to Duluth mostly Will the Millers ever let up if left to themselves? Certainly not! They have too good a thing to ever yield it voluntarily, and they never will until they are forced to do so. Public sentiment is all-powerful and can accomplish much when well-directed and properly exercised Agitate the matter. Discuss it among yourselves and in public meetings called to see what measures can be adopted to give relief. This will certainly do no harm and may do a vast amount of good. It is certainly better than sitting down and meekly submitting to the great devil. DOWN WITH THE INFERNAL MONOPOLY!

Our elevators, and those at Carman, are taking in wheat quite rapidly just now. Most wheat offered is No. 1 Hard. Occasionally a load comes in which has suffered from frost, but the amount is very trifling in proportion to the whole. —[Crookston Chronicle.

Just so neighbor. Wheat is coming in very rapidly and most of it should grade No. 1 Hard! But does it? Does the farmer, who has toiled and sweated during the year get his just deserts from "our elevators?" By reading the article above one would be led to suppose that everything is lovely in the wheat business and farmers proportionally happy paying up all of their debts and having enough left to go ahead another year. The Chronicle should know enough about this business to know that such is far from being the case. Farmers are not getting anything near like what their wheat is worth and in consequence not only themselves but business men with whom they have been dealing have to suffer for it severely. This Minneapolis Millers Association is a soulless monopoly and their stealing operations ought to be condemned instead of being galvanized by a newspaper or any other man. We were told by a prominent business man, who is interested in this wheat business, having many chattel mortgages to look out for, that the average price of wheat in this market this fall is per bushel! He said that the largest proportion of the wheat marketed is No. 1 Hard and should be so graded but is not. Does that look like the farmers were getting their just deserts? In view of these facts is it a wonder that farmers are blue and almost totally discouraged? This same business man further said to us that "we must have an open market for our wheat or else every wheat raiser in the country

WILL BE RUINED!"

Does that look like everything was so very serene? It is a patent fact among the business men in our city that this Minneapolis Millers Association is a grasping, soulless monopoly, absorbing the very life-blood of this country and it is a wonder that indignation meetings have not been held before this and some steps taken to secure relief. Every newspaper in the land, every business man and every farmer ought to make Rome howl until we can get our just deserts

AN OPEN MARKET.

"Give us a chance to sell our wheat in any market we choose" is the simple [illegible]

certainly can be nothing unreasonable in that request. Newspapers and business men should unite in that demand and push it until it is obtained. Give us that boon and relieve us from the grip of this giant monopoly and then this country would prosper as it should do. We can raise the wheat fast enough but when you come to

to enrich the Minneapolis Millers Association you are doing an act of injustice to the country which she can not long endure. Our crop this year is far better than it has been for years but our farmers and business men are not one dollar richer by it. It is a fact that wheat-raisers are losing money where they ought to make a handsome profit An open market is what they need what they must have and what they will have in time but if that time be long delayed three-fourths of the wheat-raisers will be bankrupt. They have labored hard and faithfully to raise good crops of choice No 1 Hard wheat and every year that they have had to sell to the Millers Ring they have lost money One year they sold on an open market and that year wheat was worth something and farmers made some money Down with the infernal monopoly, the Minneapolis Millers Association!

THAT CANAL.

The Minneapolis Evening Journal suggests the building of a canal from Minneapolis to Winnipeg utilizing the Minnesota and Red Rivers, and other rivers on its course. This canal, the Journal figures, would only cost $10,000,000, and by it wheat could be shipped into Minneapolis for five cents per bushel. To pay for this canal the Journal says that St. Paul and Minneapolis would chip in, Minnesota and Dakota would join the dance, Manitoba would chip in heavy, the farmers along the route would smilingly come down with the dust and then, if not enough money was thus raised "WE" could blandly walk into Congress with a bill for an appropriation to finish the little job Truly, a very pretty little scheme to give the Minneapolis Millers another ten cents per bushel (not a red cent more would the wheat raiser ever see but we can suggest a better plan yet and one that would work far better and at once without waiting to build and equip a big ditch. Let the Journal proceed to raise $10,000,000, give it to the Millers with the express stipulation that they pay our farmers all their No. 1 Hard Scotch Fife wheat is worth, and they would get every bushel of wheat raised in the Northwest and wouldn't need a "canal" to haul it either. Does the Journal fondly imagine that the farmers in the Northwest are such a set of consummate fools as to give a nickel toward such a scheme to give that grasping Minneapolis monopoly a bigger steal? The Minneapolis Millers now take all of the profit of wheat raising and the farmers know it, and it would not be a very healthy job for any man to undertake to solicit subscriptions for a scheme to further enrich the robbers whose grip upon this country is a curse worse tenfold than grasshoppers. The Journal does not understand the needs of this Northwest if it thinks we need a canal to further drain its resources.

Gold in Dakota.

Grand Forks Plaindealer: There may be gold at Lisbon and in the Sheyenne Valley and in other portions of Dakota, but the farmer of the Red River Valley who owns a first-class farm and pays strict attention to raising grain, has a gold mine and will make more out of it than two-thirds of those who have gone with the rush to Lisbon. It will be remembered that Dakota was at one time famous for the gold fields in the Black Hills, and that hundreds and hundreds of people went to that Eldorado thinking that they would make their fortunes out of the rich finds. The result was not very flattering. More made fortunes and are now living off the products of the soil than there are of those who have made anything out of the gold fields. It may be that there is a little gold ore at Lisbon, but the whole thing has more the appearance of a money making scheme on the part of a few parties than anything else. It looks like a gigantic speculation, but be this as it may, every farmer of the Red River Valley can pay strict attention to business and make more than two-thirds of those who rush to the alleged Lisbon gold fields.

The golden valley, the land of No 1 hard, is still ready to compete with the world in her wares and can be safely set down as the finest and best agricultural land ever farmed. The fame of No 1 hard from the Red River Valley will never be lessened by the reported gold fields. The farmers of the Red River Valley can be satisfied with the gold in the soil which yearly gives him a good crop of No. 1 hard, wheat 50 bushels to the acre.

CONSISTENCY(?)

It is the duty of every patriotic man who is really a well wisher of his country to defeat the party so graceless, so corrupt, that openly announces its only road to success is by the debauchery of the elective franchise. Indeed we have fallen upon evil days. God save the Republic if such men must rule!—St. Paul Globe.

Read the above extract taken from the St. Paul Globe of Tuesday then turn to our first page and read the extract from the same Globe of only a few days ago, under the heading of "The same old war-cry" in which the Globe announces that C. F. Kindred's western land investment will yield barrels of money with which to beat the Hon. Knute Nelson and purchase his way to Congress. In one breath the Globe says that a few barrels of money will buy a seat in Congress for its pet, Mr. Kindred, and in the next breath it gravely says: "GOD SAVE THE REPUBLIC IF SUCH MEN MUST RULE!" "IT IS THE DUTY OF EVERY PATRIOTIC MAN WHO IS REALLY A WELL WISHER OF HIS COUNTRY TO DEFEAT THE PARTY SO GRACELESS, SO CORRUPT, THAT OPENLY ANNOUNCES ITS ONLY ROAD TO SUCCESS IS BY THE DEBAUCHERY OF THE ELECTIVE FRANCHISE. INDEED WE HAVE FALLEN UPON EVIL DAYS!" Thus speaks the oracle of the Democratic party of the State. The organ which claims to be the bright and shining light of the great unterrified Democracy of Minnesota [illegible] its party and pr-(we liked to have said "principles, momentarily forgetting the Globe's utter lack of such a thing) "whooped'er up" for a bolting renegade Republican, this same man whom it says needs but to open out a few "barrels" of that western gold to defeat Mr. Nelson and buy a seat in Congress next fall. Hall now pretends to be a virtuous Democrat but just watch his smoke next fall when Boss Kindred orders him to whoop-er-up and the Democratic party also orders him to fall in line! Whatever will he do? He will doubtless think "indeed we have fallen upon evil days," for a fact. Out of his own sayings (and doings) is he condemned.

A Remedy for Alkali.

There must be a remedy for the alkali in the lands of the Red River Valley, which exist to such an extent as to injure the wheat crop. It has come under the observation of those who have studied the alkali question that the land affected by the alkali is that on the edges of the slough, or coolies; while the land in the slough, or that portion quite aways back and which has been drained into the coolie is not affected in the least. From this fact a valuable lesson is learned. When in the spring the entire prairie is covered with water and the ground is frozen so solid that it cannot soak through, it naturally runs to the nearest slough or coolie. Before the ground thaws the water runs off the uplands and spreads out over the low lands surrounding the coolie, there it remains and evaporates, and as it goes down leaves the alkali on the ground. When the bottom thaws out of the coolie the water soaks through immediately, taking the alkali with it, before it has a chance to evaporate.

Some time since Dr. Wheeler made a useful and valuable experiment. He took some of the Red River Valley earth and leached the alkali all out, and in the fall planted it in a porous vessel back in the soil. When the ground thawed out he again leached out as much alkali as he secured in the fall. This demonstrates that the alkali soaks through the soil, and is raised and lowered by the water level. When the water level is raised the alkali raises with it, and when it is lowered down goes the alkali. This is demonstrated by the fact that the land in the centre of a slough or coolie, produces a rich growth of grass, while the land on the sides where the water has been allowed to accumulate the ground produces nothing.

The lesson is plain of the Red River Valley contains a great deal of alkali and it is raised or lowered by the water level in the ground. When the rains fall upon the earth the land is leeched and the alkali is carried off from the high lands and is deposited on the low lands. If all the low lands of the Valley were ditched the alkali would be carried into the ditches and would not be allowed to gather on the land by the evaporation. Again, by ditching the water level on the prairie would be lowered and consequently the alkali which raises and falls with the water would be lowered. The fact seems plain that the alkali remedy is ditching. There may be various modes of ditching and grading, but the farmers of Polk County seem to have gone about it in the right way. They have in nearly every township purchased a New Era Grader and Ditcher, and while securing good drainage have at the same time secured good roads and good crops. The alkali problem, to those that have studied it, seems perfectly plain. That alkali seems to be something of salt, and it is well known that at first alkali is a kind of salt which has great wheat growing properties when not spread on too thick. It is never spread on the well drained lands too thick. It only covers the the land when the water which washes or leeches it out of the ground evaporates from the land. Good drainage will get rid of the surplus alkali.

OFFICIAL PAPER OF THE COUNTY.

CROOKSTON, THURSDAY, NOV. 8

County News.

Fisher's Fancies.

From the Bulletin.

E. A. Bradish has threshed out 2,000 bushels of wheat, and 900 bushels of oats, from 170 acres.

Jarves and Grindel have started their feed mill, and are doing a roaring trade. Now is your chance.

Mike Wentzel threshed out 4,190 bushels of wheat 1,900 of oats, and 500 barley, as a result of his labors.

On Sunday last the wife of A. C. Asselstine presented her husband with a daughter. Mother and child both doing well.

Threshing may be said to be finished. This is a long way ahead of last year. Taken altogether this season has been most propitious.

Mr. J. B. Merrill has threshed out 8,400 bushels of wheat, 4,880 of oats, and 1,000 of barley. This is the product of about 900 acres. Not so bad.

John Logan threshed out 2,100 bushels all No. 1 hard.

We regret to hear that Levi S. Myers has met with a $200 loss, by his threshing engine setting fire to two and a-half stacks of wheat. The wheat belonged to Ole Romo, and, unfortunately, was all No. 1 hard. This is the first accident Levi has ever had with a threshing engine, although he has threshed hundreds of thousands of bushels.

Mr. S. N. Griffith has terminated his engagement with the school board, as he had a right to do under the contract jointly entered into, in consequence of his obtaining a far more lucrative appointment elsewhere. By this move Miss Ames gets a step upward, that lady taking his place until the winter term commences, and Miss May Stewart falls into the line of Miss Ames. We congratulate the board on the appointments, although we are very sorry to lose such a man as Mr. Griffith.

Steenerson Bros. sold 37,000 pounds of twine this season, the freight alone on which amounted to $629.

Levi S. Myers threw up his hat with a hurrah last Tuesday, because he had finished threshing. He has passed through his thresher no less than 35,000 bushels.

We regret to hear that Mr. James McArton has suffered a severe loss through the carelessness of some of his neighbors. Some one set fire to the prairie grass and it spread beyond control, burning, in its progress, some twenty-five tons of Mr. McArton's hay.

Red Lake Falls Doings.

From the Gazette.

Below we publish a few of the yields of grain raised in the Clear Water Valley:

Moses Bray, twenty-seven bushels of A No. 1 hard wheat per acre.

Rock Lizee, twenty-two bushels of A No. 1 hard wheat per acre.

Eli Leger, thirty-three bushels of A No. 1 hard wheat per acre.

Piere Bottinean, thirty-seven bushels of A No. 1 hard wheat per acre.

J. H. Bishopp, thirty bushels of A No. 1 hard wheat per acre.

George Lablssionnere, twenty-nine bushels of A No. 1 hard wheat per acre.

G. Brunnele, twenty-three bushels of A No. 1 hard wheat per acre.

Lewis Berthiaume, twenty-six bushels of A No. 1 hard. Forty bushels of this wheat, by stricken measure, weighed just forty-seven bushels and thirty pounds.

And so the yields run throughout the entire valley.

Green Food for Swine.

Prof. S. R. Thompson, of the Nebraska Agricultural College, speaks from experience on pork growing, in the American Agriculturist for October.

Green food makes thriftier and larger hogs. Farmers who raise many pigs, and feed them exclusively on corn, know that some of the shotes will cease to grow at an early age, begin to lay on fat, and never reach the size of good, merchantable hogs. This tendency to fatten prematurely, at the expense of bone growth, is not seen to any great extent in grass-fed hogs. A pig fed on bulky green food will develop a larger stomach than one fed on concentrated food like corn; and when you come to fatten it, this enlarged capacity will enable him to eat and digest more corn, and thus fatten faster than the other, and be a more profitable hog to grow for market.

Grass-fed hogs are healthier than those grain-fed. Every intelligent breeder knows the advantages of feeding green food to sows about to farrow. They have less difficulty with their pigs, are less liable to destroy them, will give more milk, and nurse them better. The dreaded hog cholera is not much to be feared where hogs have the run of a good clover pasture. Undoubtedly, if exposed to contagion, they would take the disease, but they are not likely to develop it. For example, a farmer had his hogs in a small pen, destitute of grass, with no water except a muddy pool, which soon was made as vile as possible by the hogs. After a while the hogs began to die in considerable numbers, with symptoms resembling cholera. The owner was alarmed, took them out of this pen, turned them on a patch of green rye, and gave them water from a well. The disease was checked and the deaths ceased.

How may green food be most cheaply provided? Rye is the crop best adapted to this purpose, in the region west of the Missouri. This should be sown early in the fall, on well prepared soil, and if the growing season continues late in the fall, so that the rye is likely to joint, it must be fed down closely. The best condition for it to go into winter, is when it covers the ground with a thick mat of low leaves with but little tendency to shoot. Rye in this condition is fit to turn on as soon as growth begins in spring. The amount of food which two acres of such rye will furnish, is surprising. If not fed down too close, and the stock be turned off about the middle of May or the first of June, the rye will still make a fair crop. Hogs are sometimes left on the rye until it fills, when they will pull it down and eat the heads; but this practice is not commended. There is a time after the rye is a foot high until it is in milk, that hogs do not eat it well. A better plan is to have a field of clover or of clover and timothy or orchard grass, ready for the pigs when the rye is too large to be longer available. When the rye is getting too large, the clover is in the best state to turn upon. The clover will do well until about the middle of June, when, if the weather turns off hot and dry, it grows quite slowly. It is well to have a patch of oats sown near and ready to tide over this time. If not needed it can grow for the harvest. During the hot weather of July, August, and September, none of the crops named above can be fully relied on, and this is especially true where they have been fed too closely. Sorghum or Brown Dourra may be sown broadcast about the last of May and again the middle of June, to be used in July and August. Experience shows that Sorghum may be eaten off close to the ground when a foot to eighteen inches high, without serious injury. It will come up again and grow right along. It is also an excellent plant to stand dry weather.

We are pleased to note that the press of the Northwest are waking up to the enormity of the stealing operations of the Minneapolis Millers Monopoly, and many of our brethren are sounding the alarm. It is none too soon, brethren of the press, when war's wild alarums were rung through the land and the life of our beloved country was at stake, when treason stalked abroad by midday, unrebuked—when the giant evil, clanked its chains in every public street in "Free (?) America," then it was that the liberty-loving press sounded the call "to arms" and awoke the slumbering fires of patriotism in every manly heart, and what was the result? There were (we blush to say) some things in the guise of men who said "you NEVER CAN abolish slavery!" But it was done, nevertheless; done by the press, the pulpit and the American people ACTING AS A UNIT, united upon one common ground, for the accomplishment of one purpose. "What has been done can be," and if it is true that the hydra-headed monster, slavery, could be crushed by the will of the people, why cannot the will of the people also crush out the infernal monopoly that is the bane of the Northwest? IT CAN be done and it MUST be done and it will be done soon if the press and the people will go at it in the right way. The press should keep it before the people and the people should confer among themselves in public meetings and everywhere to devise a way out. There is a way and it can found if diligently and earnestly sought. Many ways have been suggested, granges, elevators, railroads and politics, everyone has his own method and nothing comes of it unless some united action is taken upon the question. The simple fact remains—a cold, merciless, grinding monopoly is rapidly consuming the substance of the Northwest and will continue so to do as long as we quietly submit. DOWN WITH THE MONOPOLY!

SLAVERY,

A correspondent of the Tier finds a greater evil afflicting this country than the Millers Association, USURY, and takes us to task for not including usurers in our sweeping condemnation of the steals of the Millers' Association. While we admit all that he says in regard to the evils of usury, we must take exception to his advice to us to let up on the Millers and go for the usurers, for the simple fact that the Millers are the rats who gnaw the holes in the bins letting all the wheat run out. In other words the Millers, by stealing all of the profits of the farmer drives the farmer, and the business men who depend upon the farmer, to the usurer for the money which the farmer ought to have if he got his just dues, thus furnishing the usurer the chance to get in his devilish work. We think that if our friend will consider a moment he will have to admit that we are after the true thief after all. Give the farmer an open market, thus affording him a chance to get what his wheat is really worth and he will have no need to resort to the usurer to borrow money to stave off for a little while the coming of the evil day. DOWN WITH MONOPOLY and give us an open wheat market. Our friend seems to intimate that the JOURNAL is complaining of "hard times." That certainly is not our object, for well we know there is no necessity for hard times if the farmers could but get their just dues. That is what we are after and what we shall continue to agitate until they get them and if the press and the people of this Northwest all of whom are equally interested in the issue, will unite upon one common demand, we shall get what we ask—an open wheat market. Our soil, properly cultivated, will yield the choicest of wheat, and we have no earthly business to grumble about "hard times," and there would be no such thing possible without monopoly in wheat buying. The fact that a monopoly does exist is the cause of all our disquiet and will be until that cause is removed. DOWN WITH THE INFERNAL THING!

The Fisher Bulletin has espoused the cause of the farmers in their crusade against the Minneapolis Millers' monopoly and puts in some telling blows, as follows:

"Mr. Maxwell is the name of a man who is inspector of wheat at Minneapolis; ostensibly appointed by the Board of Trade, but in reality by that 'thrice accursed' Millers' Association. This man is that is such that he can and does grade No. 1 hard No. 3 wheat, all in the interest of his rascally masters. Farmers, how long will you continue to bear this? 'Turn the rascals out.'"

"We are afraid that the villainies of the Millers' Association are affecting the Republican party. Farmers are daily getting to believe that the party is responsible for the robberies of this band of theives, and, unless something can be done, we believe that, in their ire, they will arise and make a clean sweep of the Republican office-holders."

"In proof of what we say, that the grain inspectors are thieves in the employ of the Millers' Association, one of our elevator bosses, (than whom there is not a better judge of wheat in the world) had two loads of wheat returned to him as No. 2 and No. 3 respectively, he having purchased it a No. 1 hard. Farmers, arise, unite, and see if this villainy cannot be stopped. Agitate, agitate, and have reform."

Farm Notes.

Light Seeding.

The winter months with their long evenings will soon be with us, and with them the farmer's zeal in investigating the different matters apertaining to the farm. Among the many questions they will have time to study is the one of light seeding. We are informed that several interesting experiments recently made and reported in regard to the quantity of seed necessary to the production of certain farm crops, has been satisfactorily proven that a minimum quantity of seed under proper conditions will produce a maximum crop. It is claimed, and from personal experience we have no doubt it is true, that farmers use too much seed as a general rule. A bushel of good seed wheat to the acre, says one, is better than a bushel and a peck, while others think a single eye to the hill is preferable to a whole or half of a potato; that four stalks of corn in a hill will produce more corn than six stalks; that half the usual quantity of onion seed used produce more onions; that all in all, we use too much seed. Undoubtedly there is a difference in soils. Some requires more than others, but could not the seed be planted in the ground at a proper depth, so that it would all grow, there is little doubt but what a good deal less could be used. Where there is too much seed the grain will be so thick that the stalks will be small and no chance is given for it to stool, besides the seed heads will be a good deal smaller, and the kernels not near as large, as they are when less seed is sown.

Warm Houses.

In this cold but pleasant climate, in the winter the dwelling houses should be warm, but at the same time there should be a sufficient ventilation in all the departments of the house. At best the price of fuel is high. It is well known that in a warm house, not half the quantity of fuel is required that there is in a cold one, besides the comfort and health of the family are so much more in the one than in the other. There is not a farmer in the state, but can well afford to have his house thoroughly protected against the cold winds of winter. By doing so he may not only save extravagant fuel bills, but medicine and doctors' bills. In any event he will add much to the comfort of his household, which is alone a great consideration.

The Primitive Farmer of the State.

We met a farmer recently who complained that the products of his farm did not bring as much as they did last season. While this may be true, the present farmer obtains much more for his surplus crops than the primitive farmers of the territory and state did. For instance, the agricultural editor of this paper, for several years, never obtained on an average over 50 cents per bushel for his wheat, and in order to get that he was obliged to haul it 32 miles through the woods to a river town. He, as well as all other farmers of that day in Minnsota, thought themselves fortunate if butter was worth 10 cents a pound. We sold large quantities of potatoes for 12½ cents per bushel, and was glad to get that price. Frequently eggs were only worth 3 cents per dozen, and good corn in the ear only brought 10 cents per bushel, while that which was shelled was worth a York shilling. The choicest fresh pork, say three hundred pound hogs after they were dressed went for $2 per hundred, sometimes for less money. Compare the present prices with those we speak of, and we think the farmers of the present time will admit that there is a difference in them, and that it is in their favor.

Hints About Caring for Horses.

Give horses salt frequently.

Returning from an afternoon drive, let your horse cool off before entering the stable.

Road horses should have their front feet stuffed with flaxseed meal twice a week.

Horses wearing boots should have them loosened while under the shed at the [illegible].

If your horse should pull on one line, [illegible] or throw his head up and down, and fight and pull on the bit, have his mouth and teeth examined.

The hand-pieces of driving-reins frequently become smooth from use causing the hands to shift. In such cases rub the lines with powdered resin.

If you wish to drive your horse with an open bridle, have him tried with one before putting him to your top wagon, other wise he might get away with you.

When horses overreach, lengthen the hind shoes; when they hit the front of the hind feet, have the toe of the front shoe made narrow and concave on the inside.

Some horses when trotting, in putting, their hind feet to the ground, strike principally on the toe. Such horses should have the heels lowered, and should have the heels lowered, and should wear shoes without heels.

Skunk cabbage is said to be good for heaves in teaspoonful doses night and morning. Moisten the hay and grain. Be careful with the diet. Never work a heavy horse on a full stomach.

Steel bits should be kept in a warm place until they are placed in the horse's mouth. Any person can realize the sensation of placing a cold bit in a horse's mouth, by first touching it with his own tongue.

An excellent remedy for mange is: Oil of turpentine, one pint; add cautiously two pints of oil of vitriol, stirring the mixture constantly; then add eight ounces linseed oil; to be rubbed in with a brush twice a day.

If you double team did not work to suit you to-day, one crowding to the pole while the other would pull his head to one side, see that the reins are right, and in hooking them to your wagon to-morrow put the off horse on the near side.

Tar is one of the most useful articles to be kept about a stable. Internally use a teaspoon at night and morning for chronic coughs; externally it is particularly useful in thrush and all diseases or wounds of the foot. Mixed with fish oil it is one of the best remedies for hard or brittle feet.

When heels and toes are required on a horse's shoes, instead of having the shoe turned down for the heels, have the heels and toes made of cast steel and welded on. The heels should be put on half an inch from the end of the shoe and placed lengthwise.

For a horse that "pulls," use the over check with the strap attached over the nose and under the lower jaw. For an extra hard-mouthed horse, use a four-ring bit. Have a side-loop on the front of the over-check, so that it cant be moved up and down as may be required; then have the check-pieces and over-check attached to the loose rings and the driving lines alone to the large rings.

Influenza is one of the most prevalent diseases at this time of the year. The first stage of the disease is generally mild, and will readily yield to careful, nutritious diet, such as warm mashes oatmeal, gruel, suitable clothing and proper ventilation. If the respiration is troubled and the extremities could, give a sedative medicine, rub the legs with dry mustard, bandage with flannel and send for an expert.—New York Graphic.

Profit in Strawberries.

It is well known that there are large profits from the cultivation of strawberries near city markets, or in localities convenient by railway to them. For the past five or six years a gentleman convenient by rail to the Chicago markets has constantly been increasing his acreage in strawberries with uniform success. His profits have averaged from $80 to $100 net per acre. His method for preparing the ground is as follows:—He trenches his land eighteen to twenty inches deep and as wide, filling in the bottom of these trenches five to six inches of barnyard manure. The trenches are made three feet apart for the rows of plants. The soil is placed upon the manure filling the trenches, and the surface is dressed with fine manure, lightly mixed with a little wood ashes when they can be had. He grows the Wilson mainly for market. In the past five years he has had no failure. Just before the blossoms open he covers the ground an inch or two deep with finely cut straw; the vines are never allowed to become thick. He protects in winter with straw. To secure a late crop he covers pretty deep with straw and retards growth. Both in the fall and spring he applies to the rows a solution of potash, a pound to four gallons of water. This is generously sprinkled on the plants. This method may seem expensive and tedious to the reader, but what of that if $80 or $100 can be cleared per acre. It is painstaking culture that pays at last.—Indiana Farmer.

Seed Corn.

An exchange gives the following good rules for selecting seed corn:

1. Pick the ears that set nearest to the ground.
2. Those ears having a short foot stalk.
3. From stalks having the most ears. [illegible] second ear. If the first ear is as good take that
4. Never take from a stalk having but one ear, if stalks can be found having two or more ears.
5. Always take ears that are filled out full to the end, and that run beyond the husk, if such can be had.
6. Lay up four or five times as much as will probably be wanted.
7. When you come to plant, before shelling, break every ear and see if the pith of the cob is dried up and hollow, for if it is not, the corn is not fully ripe. Then shell off the butt and tip till you come to the long grains.

How Much Hay to a Cow

This depends a good deal on circumstances. A cow that is wintered in a good warm stable will not consume near as much hay as one that is wintered in a cold one, or out of doors. There is a good deal, too, in the manner in which a cow is fed. If there is a good manger as there should be so that the hay is not wasted—and fed often, but a little at a time, so that the fodder is not wasted, there will be a great saving. We have wintered cows in this climate on a ton of hay; other winters it has taken two tons, and it is pretty safe to estimate on an average say one winter with another that 1½ tons of good hay will be required to winter a cow in good condition. There is always on every farm more or less straw fed to the stock, and frequently corn stalks and perhaps other fodder, but no farmer is safe to start in the winter with less than 1½ tons of hay to each head of stock on his farm, and probably it would be better if he had two tons. Hay is always worth what it brings in the nearest market to the farmer, but the actual cost per ton to our farmers in this latitude is not over $5. In many parts of the state, as per example in McLeod and Renville counties, the cost in the stack or in the mow is not half that sum, but all through the West the farmers can well afford to feed their stock in a most bountiful manner.

Raising Onions.

Raising onions at 40 or 50 cents per bushel, hardly pays as well as it does to raise potatoes at the same price, but while onions are always a safe crop, potatoes are not; that is to say, some year's potatoes are small and a few in the hill. On the other hand onions always grow large and the yield abundant. Some of our best farmers frequently raise six or seven hundred bushels to the acre. Our soil, being rich, deep and mellow, is very natural for onions, and since the cultivation is by hand machines we do not see but what they can be raised just as cheap as potatoes. Now our advice to those who have so many on hand this fall is to winter them. They should be kept in a cool, airy place, in thin layers, until late autumn, when transfer them to a cold, dry cellar and stored on racks in layers six or eight inches deep. In this way they will keep in a perfect state, and when spring time comes will be found to be in just as good condition as they were in the fall. In speaking of cold cellar we do not wish to be understood that it should be so cold as to freeze, but next thing to it.

Cooked Food for Hogs.

Judge Terrill of Shelbyville, Mo., thinks that three bushels of corn well soaked and fed in troughs will do as much good as five bushels thrown on the ground. He is a successful hog raiser, and good authority. When corn was 90 cents a bushel he bought shipstuff at $1 per 100 pounds, made slop of it and doubled his money in feeding pigs. He never feeds corn in the ear or on the ground. It is very evident that there is a great saving in feeding cooked food to hogs. It is attended with some expense, but the economy and profit will far exceed that, and we believe a more desirable quality of pork is made at the same time. We expect that hogs while being fattened will take on flesh more readily by being fed exclusively on food that is cooked.

November "Choice Literature."

The contents of this issue of this popular and excellent magazine are even more valuable and attractive than usual, as the following will indicate: "Count Rumford," by John Tyndall; "The Age of Trees," by J. A. Farrar; "Russia after the Coronation," by Stepniak; "Earth Movements in Java," by R. A. Proctor; The Progress of Labor," by Frederic Harrison; "The Rise and Fall of Amsterdam," by Richard Heath; "Some Social Characteristics of Australia," by Archibald Forbes; "Cycling as an intellectual pursuit," by Benjamin Ward Harrison, M. D.; "Some Poets' Dogs," by Phil Robinson; "The Foreign Policy of France," by Paul Leroy Beaulieu; "Irving's Interpretation of Shakspeare," by Edward R. Russell; "Victor Hugo," by Algernon Charles Swinburne.

Price, $1 a year; or 10 cents for specimen copy. John B. Alden, Publisher, 18 Vasey St., New York.

Closing Out Sale.

Owing to the death of Mr. Fixen, and the ill health of Mr. Hansing it becomes necessary for Mr. Theo Schmidt to close out the business of Fixen and Hansing & Co. in this city and remove to Racine to take charge of their large business interests there. Therefore the large and elegant stock of Dry goods, Gent's and Ladies Clothing, Cloaks, Overcoats, Carpets, Shawls, Boots and Shoes in fact every thing now in stock will be offered for sale at cost and below cost. This sale is POSITIVE and don't you forget it. [illegible]

D., 1882, and with a power of sale therein contained, duly recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds, in and for the County of Polk, and State of Minnesota, on the 29th day of July A. D., 1882, at 4 o'clock p. m., in book "H" of mortgages, on page 170, and no action or proceeding having been instituted at law or otherwise to recover the debt secured by said mortgage or any part thereof

Now, therefore, notice is hereby given that by virtue of the power of sale contained in said mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the premises described in and conveyed by said mortgage, viz: Commencing at the northwest corner of lot two (2.) in block twenty-six (26.) of the townsite of Crookston according to the recorded plat thereof on file in the office of the Register of Deeds in and for the County of Polk, and State of Minnesota, thence running in an easterly direction along the south line of Seventh Street a distance of one hundred and forty feet (140,) thence in a southerly course on a line parallel with the east line of Ash Street a distance of fifty (50) feet, thence in a westerly course on a line parallel with the south line of said Seventh Street a distance of one hundred and forty feet (140) to the east line of said Ash Street, thence in a northerly course along the east of Ash Street a distance of fifty (50) feet to the place of beginning, being fifty (50) feet by one hundred and forty (140) feet off of the north side of said lot (2) in said block twenty-six (26) of the townsite of Crookston as aforesaid, with the hereditaments and appurtenances which sale will be made by the sheriff of said Polk County, at the front door of the court house, in the city of Crookston, in said County and State on the 19th day of December A. D., 1883, at 10 o'clock a. m., of that day at public vendue to the highest bidder for cash to pay said debt and interest and the taxes if any on said premises and twenty five dollars attorney's fees as stipulated by and in said mortgage in case of foreclosure, and the disbursements allowed by law; subject to redemption at any time within one year from the day of sale as provided by law.

Dated Oct 25th 1883.

LOCAL NEWS.

Tickets for "Esmeralda" may be had at Tom Morris' jewelry store.

The electric light will soon blaze in Crookston. A building is being erected at the pump house which will soon be completed and ready for business.

Tennyson, the poet, members of the Royal Family, the Prime Minister of England, and other dignitaries were present on the first night of "Esmeralda" in London.

Dr. Isaac Bartlett, of Hope, Me., who is 73 years of age, who is still in good health and active practice, has lived for years on bread and milk alone and says it is the best food for every one.

Mrs. I. U. Jennings has just received a large stock of New Millinery Goods consisting of Hats, Feathers, Plumes, Plushes, Satins, Ribbons, Etc., all of the latest patterns and designs. [23-tf.

A play like "Esmeralda" is a relief to the theatre goers in cities, who have become wearied of trashy sensationalism and melo-drama. Our citizens will have an opportunity to see the fine play at Ericsson's Hall to-morrow evening.

Our thanks are due to the many kind friends who have recently come forward with the little amounts due on subscription and we trust that all who are yet in arrears will lay us under obligations to them for prompt payment this fall.

Mr. A. E. Sawyer and wife and Miss Hattie left for Faribault on Wednesday, via Fargo and Fergus Falls, accompanied by the best wishes of many friends. Mr. S. informs us that they will return in early spring to abide in Crookston.

Sampson's new flouring mill was started up on Tuesday to test its working when it was found to be in complete working order. Owing to the low stage of water in the river both of the roller mills are forced to remain idle. We learn that the same state of things exists at Red Lake Falls.

The report of town clerk Nels K. Anderson, of the town of Sauders shows 21 votes cast, viz: Hubbard, 13; Biermann, 8; Gilman 20, Frazee 1; Von Baumbach 20, Green 1; Kittelson 20, Ludwig 1; Hahn 10, Willis 1; Baker 20, Lindholm 1; on the county ticket Columbus received 21 votes, V. D. Carruth 21, Kretzschmar 20 and Beaupre 1.

On Monday a farmer brought a sample of wheat which tested 58 pounds per bushel that he was offered only 40 cents per bushel for. The wheat was Scotch Fife, as hard as a flint and apparently very little damaged and yet the sharks wanted to steal forty cents per bushel on it. How long can farmers endure that sort of thing and not be ruined?

The grand opening ball at the Keystone House at Euclid will be given this evening. Mr. W. H. Foote, the new landlord, is well known and has many friends in this city to one and all of whom he extends a cordial invitation to attend. A special train will leave our depot at 8 p. m., returning in the morning early. There will be a big crowd from Crookston if all go who have signified their intention to do so.

Boston Journal: "Esmeralda" which comes with the remarkable record of over a year's run at the Madison Square Theatre, New York, received its first performance in this city at the Park, last evening, before an audience which taxed the capacity of the house to the utmost. The play was presented in an elaborately and thoroughly admirable stage setting which equalled anything of the sort ever shown in Boston in richness, and certainly exceeded in point of beauty and good taste the frame in which any play has been set. "Esmeralda" at Ericsson's Hall to-morrow evening.

Wilkin County farmers are organizing for the fight. The Wilkin County Record, in its issue of Friday, Nov. 9th, publishes a call for a convention to be in Breckenridge on Saturday next. The call is signed by forty-three of the prominent farmers in the different towns in the county and the object stated is to form a Farmers' League Union or Association, the object of which shall be mutual protection and benefit. Every county in the Red River Valley should have an Association of a similar nature which would result in great good. We shall watch the proceedings of the Wilkin County Farmers' Association with deep interest, and we trust that the time is not far removed till Polk County shall have a similar institution. Arise, farmers, organize for the protection of your interests.

We understand that Mr. I. N. Underhill has bought an action against Pillsbury & Hurlbut, the elevator men, for a difference between 800 and 1,100 bushels of oats. Mr. Underhill raised something over 1,100 bushels of oats and sent them to the Pillsbury & Hurlbut elevator for storage; when he came to receive his tickets he was credited with something over 800 bushels. As he has reason to believe that the threshing machine gave good measure and as he knows that all of the oats threshed were actually delivered at the elevator he is naturally anxious to know what became of the balance of those oats. We have frequently listened to complaints of farmers on short weight, but have heretofore charitably considered that it might be a mistake and are glad to know that this subject is to be investigated also. Upon the result of this action [illegible] Let the good work go on until this whole business shall receive such a ventilation as it never had before, and it will result in great good to this country.

Some lawless person has been making a wreck of the front of P. J. La Chapelle's saloon building on Broadway by breaking in windows, and destroying counters &c. Mr. La Chapelle is justly indignant at such a dastardly proceeding and wishes to know if he pays taxes for protection or only for fun?

Gene Stilwell, Averill, Russell & Carpenter's rustling agent dropped down on to us to-day with his Gene-ial smile and persuasive accents. Gene has a mitey "taking" way with him—when pay day comes. He has just returned from a trip to Montana and says he would not trade a Red River Valley farm for the whole of Montana, and—as usual Gene is kirect!

On Wednesday Jim Creighton was very near furnishing a subject for a coroner's jury to "set" down on. He was unloading a heavy safe at the office of H. M. Pierce when the plank broke and let the safe fall on the sidewalk with a crash. Jim had just left the spot where the safe lit and the manner of his leaving was too sudden to mention. Jim thinks he owes his life to the fact that he is as nimble as a flea in an emergency.

As will be seen by a notice elsewhere the firm of Warninger & Trombley is dissolved, Mr. Trombley selling his interests to Mr Adolph F. Rauch, of Euclid, and the new firm will be Warninger & Rauch. Mr. Warninger is one of our oldest residents, well and favorably known and Mr. Rauch is a young man of fine business capacity who will make friends rapidly. The well known reputation of this house is a sufficient guarantee for its future success.

Watered Stock.

On Tuesday Jim Kelly had the best span of mules in the country. (Jim himself admits that they are) He had them until about 3 o'clock of that day at which time Jim's hired man, Pat Lynch, came to him and said that he had forgotten to water the mules at noon and if Jim would give him the stable key he would go and water them. Suspecting nothing wrong Jim gave up the key whereupon Pat went to the stable; got the mules and went up to Bjoin's stable and hired a buggy to go, as he said to Euclid. Pat also wanted a blanket or a robe, but Tom told him he was using all of his robes now, as the stage took an extra quantity, but Pat assured him that the robe would be back before it was needed on the stage, so Tom added a fine new buffalo robe to the outfit and Pat, and a companion drove off in high feather. About dark, as Pat had not reported since "watering" Jim's stock Jim looked into the matter and finding out how the land lay concluded that the stock had been "watered" for the purpose of being put on the market and so he swore out a warrant and the Sheriff went to Euclid on the 11 p. m. train. It is needless to say that Pat and his "pard" had not arrived yet and all day Wednesday the whole constabulary force aided by the detective force were on the qui vive. As yet no news has been received from the absent "speculators." The penalties in such cases made and provided are altogether too tame. Such deeds should be punished with imprisonment for life at the very least, (and life in such cases should last just long enough to find a handy tree and a rope.)

Council Proceedings.

COUNCIL CHAMBERS, Nov. 8th 1883.

At a special meeting of the City Fathers held on Thursday evening last all were present except Alderman Stone, Box and Bratley. Liquor license of Charlie Seely granted. A draft of an agreement between Jacobus & Chase and the city, referring to electric lights, was read and laid over till next regular session. Bids for removing earth from the railroad embankment at Sixth Street were awarded to Wm. Cunningham at 27 cents per yard. A committee to inspect the grading on Fifth Street, to ascertain what proportion thereof shall be borne by the general fund was appointed, to report at next general session. The mayor called attention to the inefficient working of the fire department under the present method of doing business (or lack of method) and recommended that Mr. M. B. Hayes be appointed Chief of the Fire Department with a salary of $60 per month and that each member be allowed $2 for services actually rendered at fires which motion prevailed. Bills to the amount of $950.89 were presented and allowed.

Dissolution Notice.

Notice is hereby given that the partnership heretofore existing under the firm name of Warninger & Trombley is this day dissolved by mutual consent. All bills due the old firm must be paid to Geo. Warninger or W. L. Trombley and all liabilities will be assumed by the new firm.

THE SUN.

NEW YORK, 1884.

About sixty million copies of THE SUN have gone out of our establishment during the past twelve months.

If you were to paste end to end all the columns of all THE SUNS printed and sold last year you would get a continuous strip of interesting information, common sense, wisdom, sound doctrine and sane wit long enough to reach from Printing House Square to the top of Mount Copernicus in the moon, then back to Printing House square, and then three-quarters of the way back to the moon again.

But The Sun is written for the inhabitants of the earth; this same strip of intelligence would girdle the globe twenty-seven or twenty-eight times.

If every buyer of a copy of The Sun during the past year has spent only one hour over it, and if his wife or his grandfather has spent another hour, this newspaper in 1883 has afforded the human race thirteen thousand years of steady reading, night and day.

It is only by little calculations like these that you can form any idea of the most popular of American newspapers, or of its influence on the opinions and actions of American men and women.

The Sun is, and will continue to be, a newspaper which tells the truth without fear of consequences, which gets at the facts no matter how much the process costs, which presents the news of all the world without waste of words and in the most readable shape, which is working with all its heart for the cause of honest government, and which therefore believes that the Republican party must go, and must go in this coming year of our Lord, 1884.

If you know The Sun, you like it already, and you will read it with accustomed diligence and profit during what is sure to be the most interesting year in its history. If you do not yet know The Sun, it is high time to get into the sunshine.

MISS LIRRIPIP'S LOVERS.

From Chamber's Magazine.

Miss Lirripip had a pretty face and five thousand a year, not to speak of expectations. Pretty faces are common enough, even in these days of agricultural depression and stagnant trade; but a girl with five thousand a year is a variety, and a girl with five thousand a year and a pretty face into the bargain is a positive phenomenon, and, as such cannot fail to be greatly admired by a number of more or less eligible young men with a taste for beauty of the more substantial kind. Even middle-aged bachelors awoke from their habitual indifference when, on being introduced to a lovely damsel of two-and-twenty they are conscious that the possessor of a considerable fortune stands before them; for, although money is the root of all evil, it is a root which most people very willingly undertake the risk of cultivation.

Since Lydia Lirripip was to us beautiful and thus rich, it is not surprising that she had not only admirers—men who dared to wish uncertain things—but lovers, too; men who had the presumption to hope. It is true that Lydia encouraged none of them, for she was quite satisfied to live at home with her father, General Lirripip, in Bruton street, Grosvenor square, and to ride in Rotton Row in the morning and to drive in the park in the afternoon. But, fortunately, young men do not require encouragement; nay, in certain affairs the less encouragement they receive the greater their persistency becomes. And, considering that healthily-constituted young women seldom, if ever, give any encouragement to young men, the persistency of these latter in the face of alarming difficulties is a matter on which all of us may heartily congratulate ourselves. Indeed, but for the persistency who knows whether the world would go round?

It was in the height of the London season, and Lydia Lirripip went with her father one evening to a great ball at the Countess of Carnaby's. Everybody was there—everybody, that is of rank and fashion—and ere she had been in the brightly-lighted rooms for five minutes Lydia was engaged for all the dances on the programme. Now, to the most of her partners she was only engaged for a single valse or a a polka, but, for old acquaintance sake, or for some other reason, she allowed three gentlemen to take two dances each. It was no doubt very indiscreet of her to do so. But, in one case, at least, it was also very good-natured of her, for she permitted old Sir Pertinax Popinjay,—who as everyone knew, was far too stiff and gouty to move about properly—to put down his name for the only two sets of lancers. Sir Pertinax was effusively grateful and smiled his sweetest upon her when he returned her programme, and Lydia, instead of regretting her kindness felt thoroughly rewarded by seeing that she was giving pleasure to the gray-haired baronet, who, thirty years before, had been a noted dandy, but who now struck her as being simply a prosy old fellow, whom very few girls would be likely to dance with. Lydia's other favored partners were Mr. Horace Freake—a young artist who had that year for the first time exhibited at the Royal Academy—and Mr. Merton Murley, a man who had no profession and no occupation, and who, if he had a private income, derived it from a source not generally known even to his friends.

In this world many strange coincidences happen. Two chemists have been known to make exactly the same discovery on the same day; and two astronomers have claimed to catch sight of a new comet at almost the same moment. It is not, therefore, incredible that, while dancing these six dances with her three favored partners, Lydia casually mentioned to each of them that, upon the following evening, her father was going to take the chair at the annual meeting of the Society for the Encouragement of Coldwater Bathing on the Continent; that she was not going, but would be alone at home; that she wished the girls were able, like men, to amuse themselves; and that she envied her partners their clubs, their theaters, and their sociable smoking concerts. Nor is it incredible that, having heard this, Sir Pertinax Popinjay Mr Horace Freake, and Mr. Merton Murley all made up their minds to call on Miss Lirripip upon the following evening, and to make to her certain avowals, which, although they had long meditated them, they now felt impelled to make as soon as possible, and without any unnecessary delay. What these avowals were may be guessed; but why the three gentlemen all determined at the same time to make them is a question that cannot be explained, although the fact that Lydia that evening looked even prettier than usual may possibly have been one of the causes of the extraordinary coincidence.

Lydia little dreamed, when in the morning she dropped off to sleep, of what was hanging over her. Sir Pertinax had made no sign; Mr. Murley had not been more attentive than had for sometime been his wont; and Mr. Freake had been actually more dull and uninteresting than Miss Lirripip had ever seen him. She therefore slept soundly, and was undisturbed by fears of the coming evening and its visitors.

The following day was wet. The General, who had for many years lived in India, and had a liver which caused him to be somewhat irascible, shut himself up in the library, and savagely studied the statistics of cold-water bathing; and Lydia, who could not go out, painted in her boudoir. The Lirripips dined at half-past 5, to enable the General to get to the meeting at half-past 7; and as he had taken no exercise during the day, and had been quite unable to master all the information he required relative to the average of cleanliness upon the Continent, Lydia's father was not in the best of tempers. "Sit up for me," he said; "I shall be in by half-past 11." These were his last words, as, the carriage having been announced, he hurried away from the table, stopping for an instant at Lydia's side to kiss her hastily on the top of the head. And Miss Lirripip was left alone in solitary grandeur, sitting at one end of the dining-room. She did not stay there long, but went to the drawing-room, whither she bade a servant bring two candles, which but dimly lighted the large apartment. Then, taking her seat at the piano, Lydia began to play and sing alternately.

The drawing-room at Bruton street was like many other London drawing-rooms. It occupied the whole of the first floor of the house, save where in one corner the staircase ascended, and it was therefore L shaped, the longer arm of the L having three windows looking out into the street, and the shorter arm one window looking out over some mews in the rear. Heavy curtains of tapestry hung between the back and front portions of the room, but were usually looped up; and in the back room was the piano, at which, within halo of the two candles, Lydia Lirripip played and sang.

She had considerable knowledge of music and a fine voice, and, wrapped up in her occupation, she started when the door of the room opened and a servant, who was to her invisible, announced Mr. Horace Freake.

Lydia rose and received her visitor, meantime ordering the gas to be lighted. It was half-past 8. Why had he called at that hour? Why had he not come in the daytime, while she was so dull, rather than just when she was singing? But, upon the whole, she was glad to see Horace, who, no doubt, simply desired to inquire how she was after the dance of the previous evening, and had not been able to do so earlier. As he betrayed, nevertheless, a certain hesitation in his manner she led the conversation, and asked him whether he had enjoyed Lady Carnaby's ball. He had, he said, pretty well; and then ensued a pause, during which Horace rather awkwardly took a seat at Lydia's side on an ottoman and gazed at the carpet. Mr. Freake was not altogether stupid, but even wits often become rather dull when they are meditating an immediate proposal; and the situation is so trying to almost every man who finds himself in it, that it amply excuses the exhibition of a little uneasiness and nervousness. Mr. Freake certainly was nervous, but he soon recovered himself.

"Your father is at the meeting, I suppose. Don't you feel it very dull all by yourself here, Miss Lirripip?"

"Oh no! I have been singing; and all day I have been painting."

"But dull, I mean, without society? I know that I do; and I have much more society, I suspect, than you have. Unless I go out, the evenings, I find, pass very slowly. I cannot get the excitement of work, for, of course, one can't paint by artificial light; and if I try to read I generally go to sleep over my work."

"I think that you must be difficult to please, Mr. Freake. You have a lovely studio, and you ought always to be able to amuse yourself among such beautiful things as you have in your house."

"No! I don't think that I am difficult to please, Miss Lirripip, for I know exactly what I want. The fact is, that a bachelor's existance is not suited for a man of my feelings and sympathies. I live wrapped up in my selfishness, and feel my heart growing colder and colder every day. I have beautiful things in my house, but they don't satisfy me. I want living beauty—something which I may really care for—something which shall make my life complete. And it was to talk to you about this, Miss Lirripip that I came to see you this evening."

Lydia experienced a curious sensation which she had never felt before.

"You know, I suppose, Miss Lirripip," he continued, "what I mean. You know that since I first saw you, three or four years ago, I have loved you." And Horace took Lydia's unwilling hand. "Can you," he went on, "learn to love me? Will you be my—"

Ratatattatattattat! There was a knock at the front door, and Lydia was greatly relieved.

"Is some one coming up?" asked Horace anxiously. "Oh, I so much want to tell you all. Say you are not in. Send them away. But let me stay. Promise to let me stay."

A voice, evidently Mr. Merton Murley's, was now audible from below, the drawing-room windows being open and the voice being loud.

"It is Mr. Murley," said Lydia. "I expect that he only wants me to give some message for him to my father. He will not detain me But if I let you stay, you must not talk any more as you have been talking, Mr. Freake!"

At this moment there were footsteps on the staircase, and Horace, without another word, fled incontinently into the back drawing-room and rapidly drew the curtains behind him so as to conceal himself from the new-comer, who immediately afterward was announced.

Mr. Murley was not so nervous as Mr. Freake had been upon his first appearance. He shook hands with Lydia in an easy and light-hearted manner, paid her an airy compliment, seated himself comfortably opposite her, and, without many preliminaries, revealed the object of his visit. "I know that your father is out, Miss Lirripip," he said, "and I may as well confess at once that I have deliberately taken advantage of his absense to come and see you upon a subject which nearly concerns my happiness. I should have spoken about it last night but that I could not command your attention save for a few moments at a time. Now, however, we are safe from interruption."

"But Mr. Murley," said Lydia, "it would be so much better if you would call when my father is in."

"Oh, that is not important, my dear Miss Lirripip. It is a subject that may be settled by you alone."

"Please, Mr. Murley, do not tell me about it now," pleaded Lydia. "The windows are open, you know, and there are servants about the house, and—"

Ratatattatattattat!

This time Horace, as well as Lydia, was greatly relieved; but Mr. Murley was furious. "Let me see you to-morrow," he said hastily.

"Yes! no! no!" returned Miss Lirripip, thankful for an opportunity of getting rid of him. "Good-bye, Mr. Murley, good-bye!" and the same servant who showed up Sir Pertinax Popinjay showed down Mr. Merton Murley, who glared at the Baronet with a look that spoke volumes.

"My dear Lydia," said Sir Pertinax as he offered both his hands to Miss Lirripip, "you were really charming last night. I never saw such a perfect slyph in my life, and many people agreed with me. You are the belle of the room. There is no doubt about it."

"I'm sure it is very good of you. Sir Pertinax to say so," returned Lydie. "But I thought that the countess herself—"

"Oh, the countess! She and you cannot be mentioned together, my dear, Everyone said so. And besides, the countess of course, is married. She has met her fate. Ha, ha! But you—you are still my dear Miss Lydia. I may be a fool, but, upon my honor, I have come here this evening with the determined intention of asking you whether you will have me. You know I worship the very ground you stand on." And, to Lydia's great consternation, the old gentleman, ere she could prevent him, gallantly knelt at her feet and took her hand, with the evident intention of pressing it to his lips.

"Do get up, please, Sir Pertinax," said Miss Lirripip, forgetting for a moment that Horace Freake was within hearing, but anxious that the baronet should not make himself unnecessarily ridiculous even to her. "You can talk just as well if you sit down; but really, I don't want to be married; indeed, I don't. You know I like you very much, but I could not possibly marry you."

Sir Pertinax rose with dignity and looked rather disappointed. "I had hoped, Lydia, that you liked me well enough even for a husband. What you say, however, may not be final, because nothing can alter my regard for you, and perhaps in the future you may think better of me."

"I could not think better of you than I do," returned Miss Lirripip feelingly, "and you do not know how sorry I am that this has happened. We can never again be the same to each other. I am so sorry."

Sir Pertinax began to feel sorry, too, for up to that evening he and Lydia had always been like uncle and niece, and, in an uneasy way he turned the conversation into another channel. But he could not for long carry it on, and in less than a quarter of an hour he said good-bye, like a sensible man as he was in spite of his weakness, and departed.

No sooner had he quitted the room than Horace emerged from his hiding place. Lydia blushed to remember all that he had overheard; but he did not allude to it. "Lydia," he continued, almost as if nothing had happened to disturb him, "I love you truly, and with all my heart. Will you, can you, learn to love me, for your love alone will make me completely happy?"

"Do not ask me," replied Lydia, who was once more seated. "You know what I have just gone through My head is in a whirl."

"But think how happy you can make me, Lydia! You would be everything to me, as indeed you are already, and I would spend all my days in making you happy."

It is unnecessary to chronicle the whole of the further conversation that took place. Suffice it to say that at last Miss Lirripip discovered not only that she could, but that she actually did, love Horace Freake a little, and on the strength of that she promised to marry him.

Horace was in the act of presuming upon this promise by kissing Lydia for the first time, and was enjoying one of the happiest moments of his life, when another of those furious rattats shook the house.

"Another?" said Mr. Freake with a smile. "I shall go back to my retreat until we know who has arrived, for now I must be on the spot to look after you." And, in spite of Lydia's protestations, he at once more retired to the back drawing-room.

Two minutes afterward, the General, very hot and very angry, stamped upstairs and burst into the presence of his daughter. "Everything has gone wrong!" he exclaimed. "They voted me out of the chair; they flew in my face; they decided that the wretched foreigners don't want cold baths." And he pounded with his stick, which he had brought up with him, and looked at Lydia, as though she was the cause of his discomfiture.

"Well, papa," said Miss Lirripip, soothingly, "all the better. Now you won't have to go to any more of their horrid meetings."

At this juncture, Horace, who was troubled with a slight cold, gave forth a stifled and infinitesimally small sneeze.

"Lydia," cried the General, as he threw himself wearily into an armchair, "I'm sure there's a cat in the back drawing-room. Go and turn it out." And Miss Lirripip, having no alternative went cautiously behind the heavy curtains, and was there received in her lover's arms.

"You cannot speak to him to-night," she whispered. "He would not listen to you. You see how cross he is. Come again to-morrow."

Horace, therefore, silently took another kiss; and Lydia, having unlocked the little-used door of the back room chased him, with many expressions of animosity, down the softly carpeted staircase, and with a cry of "shoo, cat!" finally let him out of the front door.

When she returned to the drawing-room, General Lirripip gave vent to some angry expressions of hostility toward the entire feline tribe, and when he had thus delivered himself went off to bed.

How the story ended may easily be guessed. When Lydia's father was in a cooler mood, Horace found no difficulty in obtaining his consent to the marriage, which took place three months afterward; and to the end of their days, neither Sir Pertinax Popinjay nor Mr. Merton Murley had any idea that a third person was present when they proposed to Miss Lirripip in Bruton street, Grosvenor square.

Solar and Terrestrial Weather.

The recent warm spells of weather, and the remarkably low pressures over the country, seem to be due to some excess of solar heat. There is one question among scientists whether the maximum activity of the sun, as evinced by his huge mysterious spots, is now impending or past. But there can be no doubt that since the middle of 1882, when Professor Facchini at Rome noted a marked increase in the number of spots, the forces of combustion on the sun's surface have been unusually active.

In the current number of the North American Review, Professor Balfour Stewart gives some strong reasons for concluding that during a period of maximum spottedness the sun is sending the earth a maximum supply of heat—"that the magnetical and meteorological process of the earth are most pronounced when there are most sun spots and this would seem to indicate that the sun's radiation is stronger on such occasions. This view in conformity with direct solar observation and with all observations of terrestrial weather changes on a large scale yet recorded.

This conclusion of Professor Stewart has far more than a scientific interest, for if it is correct, and the sun-spot maximum is not past, we may hope for an early improvement on the inclement seasons of of 1883. The first effect of an exceptional radiation of solar heat on the earth would be felt in excessive evaporation of the oceans and consequent excessive cloudiness and rainfall, involving an unusual amount of cold, dreary weather. But this would afterward give way to clearer skies and more genial seasons.

More than a month ago the Herald pointed out that the probabilities were in favor of a milder autumn on the eastern side of the country than the comparatively cold summer, and especially its closing weather, indicated. This forecast is apparently being now realized. October's maximum heat in this locality has exceeded eighty degrees (on the 11th inst.) which is the highest temperature recorded here so late in this month, with but two exceptions, since 1873. The present meteorological conditions over the country, and so far as known, in the West Indies, increase the probability that this forecast will yet be more fully verified.—New York Herald.

A HUMAN FIRE.

The Phenomenon of a Burning Mine Repeated in the Physical system

A few years ago one of the most important coal mines in Pennsylvania caught fire. It started slowly but soon obtained such headway that it spread through the greater portion of the entire mine. To flood it with water would extinguish the fire, but well nigh ruin the mine; and still the flames continued to increase. At that juncture a young man stepped forward and suggested that all the entrances and vent holes of the mind be covered and secured, thus shutting off the supply of air. His advice was followed and the flames were finally subdued.

To compare the condition of this mine with many phases of the human system is most natural and appropriate. "Fire in the blood" is not a mere expression it is a most serious fact. How it originates, it may be impossible to say; but that it burns and rages with an increasing fury, the one who is its victim only too painfully knows. The blood is the life. It is designed by nature to purify, strengthen and sustain the system. It is too often made the channel through which poison and death are transported. Poisonous acids coming through the veins and arteries inflame and cause a fire just as real as the one which existed in the mine. They burn and irritate causing the brain to become weak and the nerves unstrung; they carry pains to the muscles and leave agonies in the joints; they bring destruction instead of strength; they devastate the very portions of the body that most require help, and they hasten the approach of death in its most horrible form. These things have been felt by innumerable people who have been the victims of rheumatic disorders, and the agonies they have endured confirm this description.

There is but one way by which this fire in the blood can be extinguished, and that is by shutting off the supply of these poisonous acids. The lactic, lithic, and uric acids comes in to the blood through the liver and kidneys, and they remain in solution in the blood producing inflammatory rheumatism, sciatica, lumbago, neuralgia, gout and all rheumatic fevers and affections. When they are deposited as gritty crystals in and near the joints, they cause articular rheumatism; when in the muscles, muscular rheumatism and lumbago; when in the tissues covering the nerves, sciatica; when in the face, head and nerves generally, neuralgia. In every case they are painful; in most instances dangerous. Inflammatory rheumatism is likely to locate in some joint and become chronic, or suddenly attack the brain or heart, causing apoplexy or heart disease. The fire in the blood must be extinguished—the supply must be shut off. This can only be done by guarding the portals to the blood—the kidneys and liver; and no means has ever been found for accomplishing this which can equal Warner's Safe Rheumatic Cure. It acts directly upon the seat of the disorder; it extinguishes the fire by controlling the supply and removing the cause.

The well known standing of H. H. Warner & Co., of Rochester, N. Y., the remarkable success which Warner's Safe Cure has achieved, being endorsed by no less a personage than Dr. Robert A. Gunn, Dean of the United States Medical college, New York, and the fidelity with which they have carried out all their promises to the public, should be a sufficient warrant that the above statements are true. They, however, guarantee to cure ninety-five per cent. of all rheumatic troubles, especially acute, knowing full well that the demonstrated power of the remedy justifies them in so doing. Nothing can be fairer than this, and those who suffer in the future from rheumatism with such an offer before them, do so on their own responsibility, and can blame no one if living pain and untimely death are the results.

Self-limitation of Diseases.

Once, when one cut his finger, he thought to cure the wound by putting on some healing balsam. As a matter of fact, it would have healed just as soon and well if bound up at once in its own blood and thus simply protected from dirt.

The power to heal belongs to our physical organization, So, too, many a poison fails to cause death simply because the system, by its own established method of working, gets rid of the poison through the various eliminating organs, and then repairs whatever of harm may have been done. In some cases the only object of the remedy used is to stimulate the eliminating organs to special activity, or to sustain the system while the elimination is going on. In all ordinary cases a cold cures itself in a few days—often in spite of the nostrums taken. Give a typhoid patient abundance of pure air, sponge his body frequently with a little soda and water, to reduce heat, and keep up his strength with a milk diet, and in the great majority of cases he will recover without a spoonful of medicine. Shall we get along, then, without a doctor? No; for the case might prove to be one, calling for the latter's utmost vigilance.

We would merely impress on our readers the fact that the fever—and the same is true of others—is self-limiting; and that the cure comes from within us truly as it does in a case of a cold or of a cut.

A similar limitation was affirmed, even in respect to brain diseases, cancer and consumption, by the New York doctors at recent meeting. One said that members of his own family were living at an advanced age who, in earlier life had had all the signs of pulmonary consumption; that he had repeatedly seen the same thing in others; that forty years ago a patient of his—whose brother and sister and all the latter's children died of consumption—had had repeated bleeding of the lungs, had great emaciation and sinking in of the chest, and and was apparently about to die, but rallied; ten years ago had a worse attack; was not expected by a council of physicians to live through the winter, yet is now in perfect health and weighs one hundred and ninety pounds. Thus there is room for hope even when given up by the doctor.—Youth's Companion.

A Pushing Climate.

"An' then," said the Old Settler, of Pine County, Pa., "look to the hemispear what lays off to the south of us. Look at Cuby. Look at any o' them countries down thar. The only way they kin tell New Year's and Christmas Day, apart in them countries is because New Year's is a notch or two warmer than Christmas Day, an' they's a leetle bigger passel o' flowers in Janiwary. The frost never ketches the buckwhit down thar, an' if they want to, b' gosh, they kin set a raisin' o' new crop batter ev'ry month in the year. Things jist grows, an' grows, an' grows, an' gits ripe ez often ez they durn please, an' folks jist gathers 'em or ships 'em away to get rid of 'em. Why, durn it, things can't help growin' in Cuby! You kin graft a slip off'n a banauner tree onter a fence-post down thar, an' in half a day it'll be blossomin' like the rose, an'nex' day you kin go out an' eat bannaners off'n it till you think you must surely be from Jersey, an' in town on circus day. They tell me that they don't hev to hev no nub on the bottom o' the th'nom'ters in Cuby, 'cause they ain't no use for it, but that they put the nub on top, 'cause the degrees always climbs up'ards in that pushin' climate."

Small Bed Chambers.

There is reason to believe that more cases of dangerous and fatal diseases are gradually engendered annually by the habit of sleeping in small, unventilated rooms than have occurred from a cholera atmosphere during any year since its appearance in this country. Very many persons sleep in eight by ten rooms, that is, in rooms the length and breadth of which multiplied together, and this again multiplied by 10 for the height of the chamber, would make just 800 cubic feet, while the cubic space for each, according to the English apportionment for hospitals, is 2,100 feet. But more, in order "to give the air of a room the highest degree of freshness," the French hospitals contract for a complete renewal of the air of a room every hour, while the English assert that double the amount, or over 4,000 feet, is required. Four thousand feet of air every hour! And yet there are multitudes in the city of New York who sleep with closed doors and windows in rooms which do not contain 1,000 cubic feet of space, and that 1,000 feet is to last all night, at least eight hours, except such scanty supplies as may be obtained of any fresh air that may insinuate itself through the little crevices by door or window, not an eighth of an inch in thickness. But when it is known that in many cases a man and wife and infant sleep habitually in thousand feet rooms it is no marvel that multitudes perish prematurely in cities; no wonder that infant children wilt away like flowers without water, and that 5,000 of them are to die in the city of New York alone during the hundred days which shall include the 15th of July, eighteen hundred and—! Another fact is suggestive, that among the 50,000 persons who sleep nightly in the lodging houses of London, expressly arranged on the improved principal of space and ventilation already referred to, it has been proved that not one single case of fever has been engendered in two years! Let every intelligent reader improve the teachings of this article without an hour's delay.—Builder.

A Fact Worth Remembering.

FARMERS' COLUMN.

Clean Beds for Animals.

All kinds of farm stock, whether kept in a stable or in yards, should be provided with a clean place to sleep in at night, and in winter with plenty of warm clean bedding. Animals are usually just as particular about such matters and enjoy a clean bed as much as their owners and if any one doubts it he should try a bundle of black filthy straw, and then one that is clean and bright, and see how quickly the latter will be selected for a bed. A sick horse that cannot be induced to lie down in any other way, will often take to a bed of clean bright straw. The farmer who desires to increase the size and quality of his manure pile should use plenty of bedding under his stock; besides the increase of fertilizers for his land, he will add much to the comfort of his stock.

Honey by the Barrel.

Apiarists in the northern States usually speak of their honey crop by stating the number of pounds or boxes secured during the season, but in Florida, it appears that honey is measured in barrels, and from a recent number of the Enterprise Herald we learn that the happiest set of men in the vicinity of New Smyrna, Fla, are the apiarists. Mr. Olaf Oleson extracted over forty barrels of choice honey, and was then compelled to stop for the want of barrels. But further on we are informed that Mr. Oleson, after filling all the barrels he had with choice honey, saved the remainder in neat one-pound sections. This was certainly quite a drop in the size of vessels, but it may be that Florida barrels are different from the vessels which pass under that name in our part of the country. If honey-bees do so well in Florida, it is to be hoped that apiarists will take advantage of it, and help to supply the great demand for honey.

Foot and Mouth Disease.

Foot-and-mouth disease is one of the most insidious foes the owner of live-stock has to fear, because the contagion may be carried in clothing or other materials, and after an indefinite period plant the germs of the disease in healthy animals. As the period of incubation is short—from to six days—and the duration of the disease is, where good care is taken of the patient, about fifteen days, many think that there is but little danger of importing the malady. But it has been shown that there are strong reasons for fearing that this distemper will be brought to America through the ignorance or carelessness of those who are engaged in handling cattle exported from this country. Ropes which were were used to tie diseased cattle, in English wharves set aside for the reception of foreign animals, have been brought to the United States and used for fastening American cattle on the voyage to England. It is easy to imagine many ways in which one of these ropes, or some article of clothing which had been in contact with cattle suffering from foot-and-mouth disease, might find the way to some inland place and there form a new center of contagion. Surely there is urgent need of national laws for the protection of live-stock interests of America, which vast they are, are yet in their infancy.

Sunshine for Wheat.

"High quality in wheat," remarks the American Economist, "can only be obtained where there is sufficient heat in summer for its perfect elaboration. There is nothing that will take the place of sunshine. In this respect the climate of the United States is far better for the production of wheat of high quality than that of Great Britain. The best wheat years in England are the dryest and hottest. With 'high farming' there is nothing which the English wheat-grower so much dreads as a cold, moist summer. Could he be always sure of an American summer he could calculate on obtaining an average yield of not less than forty bushels per acre, and of the highest quality. But should he make his land rich enough to produce a heavy crop in a dry season, and a cool, moist summer should ensue, his wheat will all be laid and not yield half a crop. So far as the summer climate is concerned, therefore the American wheat-grower has everything that he can desire. Ours is the climate for "high farming."

Farming Notes.

Fifty years ago not a merino sheep could be found that could furnish five pounds of cleansed wool from one year's growth—now there are merino's that grow ten pounds of cleansed wool in that time.

People are constantly learning to appreciate mutton as the most wholesome of meats and the demand for the choicer grades is evidently destined to outrun the supply for the immediate future at least.

Some patient apiarian enthusiast who has watched their movements, concludes that the proboscis of the bee must be inserted into 500 clover heads before one grain of sugar can be obtained. There are 7,000 grains in a pound, and as honey contains three-fourths of its weight of dry sugar, each pound of honey represents 2,500,000 clover tubes sucked by bees.

Vast quantities of manure are annually wasted, or rather misapplied and over-applied, by being drawn out in a hurry and deposited many times on portions of the field which do not need it the most, a whole load being often thrown off in three or four heaps not ten feet apart. Likely enough it is only because an overabundance is often applied to the acre, and because it is frequently carelessly spread, that the full benefits are not always obtained. Even a somewhat scanty but very uniform application nearly always gives better returns than a lavish one. Prudence should seek to distribute the manure over the largest area possible, the aim being to maintain the whole field at a uniform, superior medium, rather than a small part at a maximum and a greater part at the mimimum condition of fertility.

A wagon load of manure of the usual size, contains from 50 cubic feet to half a cord; but a squarely-shaped, large load contains 72 cubic feet. The number of piles this will make ranges from eight to twelve, and placed from 20 to 24 feet apart. A good application should be nine piles to the load—six bushels, or eight cubic feet to each pile, placed 24 feet apart—an interval not exceeding very much the distance from the hind end of the dump boards to the horses' noses, making eight loads, or four-and-a-half cords to the acre.—Rural New Yorker.

Miscellaneous Recipes.

Ornamental Chairbacks.—Pretty odd chairbacks are made of squares of linen and of satin. This seems at first a strange combination, but the effect is excellent. Where the squares are joined, cover the seams with fancy stitches. The satin squares may be left without ornamentation, and all the work be put on the linen ones. Embroidery, or painting or etching, is the favorite method employed.

An extremely simple way of ornamenting the square of flannel which you put over baby in his carriage is to crochet a row of open work and a small scallop on the edge and run a bright ribbon through the open spaces.

Tidies.—Tidies that will endure are made of fine wheels crocheted of thread, and made with a crocheted border so that they are square, then put alternate squares of silk or satin, tie in fringe across the bottom. In order to do this it is necessary to crochet one row of open work across the lower edge of the silk squares.

Covers.—Neat and very tasteful covers for the sideboard are made of crash. Choose the best quality. Across each end put a border in Kensington stitch, with silks that are warranted not to fade; then put a row of drawn work, and below that a hem an inch wide, and on the edge of that put deep torchon; this should be fulled a little. Pretty table scarfs are made of this also; and the long tidies that are caught with a ribbon bow in the center, are both ornamental and useful.

A new fancy in the crazy quilt line is to have in the exact center of the quilt a block of plain satin with the initials, in monogram or otherwise, of the owner of the quilt. Another new departure is to have each block the embodiment of an idea, or at least to have each block develop method in madness. For example, let one have Kensington work in outline patterns only, and other needle work of different kink, or applique, or painting. The foundation of these blocks must necessarily be of plain colors in silk, satin or velvet.

Suits for Boys.

Scotch cloths and cheviots of mixed colors, but no defined figure, are chosen for the every day suits of boys who wear short trousers. These have the knickerbocker sack with box pleats from the neck down, and a wide belt worn very low to look long waisted and which may pass all around the body, or else begin next the back pleats and cross only the sides and front. Braid binding, or a corded edge of braid, or else rows of stitching, are the finish for these. The straight pantaloons have four buttons on the outside seam at the knee, or else they are finished there with a strap and buckle. They fit closely, and are worn with long black ribbed stockings. From eight to twelve years of age is the period when these suits are worn, and boys in their teens, and young men also wear such suits in the country in the summer. Brown, blue and hunter's green tricot cloths are chosen for best suits for small boys, and diagonal cloths are also used. These have single breasted pea jackets curved away below the waist in front, and worn with a rolling collar either notched like a man's coat collar or else with round corners. There are no changes in the kilt suits worn by boys from four to eight years of age. The Jersey skirt of webbing laced just below the throat in front is a useful waist to wear with various kilt skirts of flannel, cloth or plaid wool.

Give the Boy Fair Play.

Many a boy, says a writer in the Philadelphia Teacher, gets to himself a bad name because of the rapidly developing faculties within him which are seeking employment. Most of what passes for juvenile depravity may be easily accounted for. Mischief is not meanness; it is misdirected energy. Intentionally wrong doing is generally the farthest from the boy's thought. The force of temptation and impulse overcomes his own choice and power of resistance, while the impudence, ill temper or reckless haste of the teacher sometimes prompts him to make an example of such an unlooked for infraction, lest advantage be taken of it to overthrow good order. This is an enormous blunder, and cannot be easily excused. The evils of the human heart cannot be cured by harshness; what your boy wants is fair play. What most people of older growth need is more of kindness and forbearance. If a boy has lost his rank among the pure and good, win him back again. He cannot be forced to change his desires. Repression will most likely drive him beyond the power of your influence, but he will take pride in earning his way back to a forfeited place in good society.

Black, White and Gray.

There are many ladies to whom colors are distasteful who still do not wish to be considered as wearing mourning. For those the choice lies between black, white and gray, a range which is not so restricted as it appears when the tints of white, the varieties in black, and the shades from steel and iron to ash in gray are taken into consideration. One of the best costumes for autumn wear of this description is a fine black camel's-hair, made with narrow kiltings, glove-fitting basque and graceful drapery, the front of the basque tucked and outlined like the narrow standing collar, with plaited lace, The cloak may be long, gathered at the back, and with high sleeves, a ruche of lace at the throat and and jabot down the front.

A lady who possesses a fine figure may construct a pretty and effective toilet out of soft surah and a silk jersey by gathering the surah flounces and placing them upon a skirt which is attached to a deep, well-fitting bodice of twilled silk. Over this a silk Jersey is drawn like an elastic and yielding skin, and outlines the figure beautifully, besides forming a lovely basis for finish of lace at throat and wrists. A beautiful dress in black and white is arranged with handsome satin duchesse and fine inserted plaitings of ivory satin, veiled with black lace, the upper dress forming a coat, the lower a demi-trained skirt with triple-plaited back. A simple but very stylish reception dress of ivory armure brocade, the bodice pointed front and back trimmed a long square with embroidery on ivory satin, edged on both sides with exquisite Mechlin lace; sleeves to the elbow, also trimmed with embroidery and with lace. Skirt draped slightly in front, and arranged at the back as a very graceful train. A pretty steel gray dress, with bonnet to match, is o cashmere and satin, the latter forming the kiltings, the former the upper dress, and the foundation for delicate, star-like embroidery of steel and chenille.

Decorative Work.

Handsome portieres for the doorway are made of sateen. The ornamentation is largely a matter of taste and of means. Painted in water colors it may be very elegant, or with some picture done in outline stitch, or with plain bands of plush it is tasteful.

A novel substitute for a tidy is simply a bow of ribbon. This, is of handsome ribbon, looks extremely well on the back of a small sofa, and if this is in two parts, put a bow on each one. The ribbon should be wide, and of good quality. If inclined to decorate, a spray of flowers hand-painted or embroidered would be appropriate and pretty.

Very handsome wall pockets, to hold papers, are made of plush. Two boards are required for this. The one intended for the back must be a size larger than for the front. Gilt nails may be put in the sides or rings of brass, and the board to be held together by ribbons laced back and forth. A handsome bow of satin or ottoman ribbon is effective if placed in the center of the front board.

A handsome and easily made bracket for a corner is made of a stripe of black satin about ten inches deep. On this embroider or paint a vine with green leaves and red berries. Line the satin with some stiff material, and ornament the lower edge with crescents, attached to it by chords of black silk. The upper edge may be fastened to the shelf by tiny silver-headed nails, or it may be tacked on the wrong side and turned over, so that no heading is necessary.

Current Paragraphs.

The Georgian's mouth waters while he talks of 'possum, hedged in with brown gravy and sweet potatoes with sugar on them. Old hunters tell us the 'possum dog will never eat a 'possum or the bones of one. A Georgia editor, who attended a hunt and the subsequent feast, remarks: "It was the first 'possum we ever ate, but if our legs hold out it will not be the last one."

Water is scarce in New Orleans, and in consequence over $100 000 worth of property has been burned in less than a month. An exchange says the gutters smell to heaven; only the rich can afford the luxury of a bath; washer women have struck; the water-cart has a monopoly at high prices of drinking water; and burglaries of water are committed at night by men armed with buckets.

British administration in Cyprus is greatly improving the condition of the people. The law courts have been reformed, the people are able to buy more luxuries than formerly, crime is diminishing, and the revenue has increased 45 per cent. Sheep and goats are increasing in number, sanitary arrangements are improving, and the general condition of the people is that of steadily advancing prosperity. The acquisition of the island was a costly job for England, but the prospect now is that it will in time become self-supporting.

The story is told in Paris of an American lady who at an inn in Normandy was deputed, as being the best French scholar in her party, to make the arrangements for their accommodation. She did her best—which was a long way short of perfection—but the clerk did not catch her meaning, and his remarks were jargon to her. Finally, in desperation, she said, slowly and with awful distinctness. "Do—you—speak—English?" "Wa'al, neow you're jest talkin," shouted the clerk. "Guess I'd orter speak English, I was raised ten miles from Ban-gor."

A correspondent of a Georgia paper sensibly remarks: "It is a pity that every farmer in Georgia could not have an opportunity to ride through New England. The wonderful economies which the people have been compelled to adopt, and the wonderful energy that has made the adoption possible, are evident on every hand and even a fleeting glimpse would be more convincing than a hundred columns of description."

In New York oyster shops, stabbers, as the openers of oysters in the Boston style are called, are taking the places of the crackers, whose fashion is to lay the bivalve on a block and break off a piece of the shell at the thin edge. Still another kind of workman is the sculler, who holds the oyster in his left hand and gives a kind of sideways sculling motion to the knife, differing from the direct stab.

In England an absurd fashion has set in of undervaluing pictures as ornaments for a room. The room itself, say the apostles of the new dispensation, must be a picture. Nothing but decorative art is permissible. An art patron not long since got a well-known decorator to produce an ideal dining room. When it was finished he asked. "Where shall I put my pictures?" The reply was. "Your pictures would spoil the room. You must build a gallery," and the art decorator laughed scornfully when the poor householder pleaded. "But I bought my pictures to live with!" Fewer and fewer pictures are now hung on English walls.

Irish-Americans who have visited the old country during the summer report that the farming class has not been for years in so prosperous condition. The report of Sir Rivers Wilson, Contreller General of Savings Banks, just issued, confirms this. Last year the average of deposits in Ireland was larger than in England or Scotland, reaching £6 1s 1d, while in England and Wales it was £4 8s, and in Scotland, £3 4s 10d.

Every theater critic has his own peculiar style. The editor of a mining-camp newspaper, for example, has this to say of a popular songstress: "As a singer she can just wallop the hose off any that ever wagged a jaw on the boards. From her clear, bird-like upper notes, she would canter away down to the bass racket, and then cushionen back to a sort of spiritual treble that made every man in the audidnce imagine every hair on his head was the golden string of a celestial harp, over which angelic fingers were sweeping."

Downfall of the Sons of Malta.

It is perhaps not generally known, but the dissolution of the sons of Malta throughout the United States was the result of an unfortunate and fatal accident here. George Harding an employe of the wholesale grocery establishment of Reynolds, Earl & Hatcher, a brave and brawny Scotchman, desired to become a member of the order, and the order was only too glad to "take him in." A night was set apart for his initiation, and he was a particularly powerful man, the gathering of the clans was unusually large. The initiation proceeded amid uproarious fun up to the elevated railway and a plunge into the seething waters of the lake—a wet blanket in the hands of a dozen strong men, in which the aspirant was tossed about until they became exhausted. Harding was an intensely earnest man, and took the initiation to be a secious affair, being told by the grand conductor that from the elevated railway he would be plunged into a lake, he had contracted his muscles and nerves himself for the battle with the waves. When he struck the blanket the shock was too great for his nerves. He was taken to his home a paralytic. He lived a year, suffering intensely, and died in great agony. The order paid out over $2,000 in his behalf. All that medical skill could do was done, but to no purpose. He was a nobleman and bore his sufferings like a hero or a martyr, never once complained or spoke harshly of those who innocently caused it all. His sufferings and death were the death-knell of the Sons of Malta, not only in Lafayette but throughout the country.—Lafayette (Ind.) Courier.

GEN. STEEDSMAN'S TITLE.

How He Came to Be Called "Old Chickamauga."

As we sat, one night in 1875, in the ratty old editorial rooms of the Toledo Democrat and Herald, of which Steedman was "leader" writer and managing editor, I asked him for the story of Chickamauga, where he won his stars and the soldier title of "Old Chickamauga," of which he was so proud. He told it as coolly as if it was a dream to him:

"Why, my boy, there wasn't much to it. I was in charge of the first division of the reserve corps of the army of the Cumberland, and had been stationed at Rin gold, on Redhouse bridge over the Chickamauga. My orders were explicit 'to hold the bridge at all hazard,' and prevent the enemy from flanking General Thomas. The enemy disappeared from our front. The sound of canonading and battle to the northward told me that the enemy had massed against our centre, and a great battle was on. From the noise of conflict I judged, and rightly, that Thomas was sorely pressed. I felt that my command was needed, and yet could not understand the absence of new orders. I waited impatiently enough from daylight till nearly noon, hoping for some word from my commanding officer. Finally I decided to risk my neck rather than see the union army destroyed through inactivity on my part. Calling a council of officers and men, I explained the situation, read my orders, told them my decision, and that on my shoulders should fall whatever of responsibility attached to the disobedience of orders. You know the inexorable military law is 'to ask no questions, obey all orders, and accept consequences.' I know that if my movement was a failure, my judgment mistaken, nothing less than court-martial awaited me. But the battle was on, and every fibre in me said I was wanted. We burned the bridge, and marched by the cannon's sound to Thomas's aid. Through cornfields, thickets, and oak woods we made a fearful tramp, for no man in the command knew the country, and our only guide was the cannon's boom. When I reported to Thomas he was in despair at the loss of the key to his position, which had just been captured by Gen. Hindman's rebel corps. The place was indicated to me by a flash of guns and a rattle of canister on the dry leaves of the tree under which Thomas and I stood. It was a steep ascent, with a densely peopled crescent ridge, that lay before us. There was a forbidding thicket and an oak forest between us and the belt of rocks that marked the edge of a broad plateau on which the enemy was jubilant with victory. 'There, there,' said Thomas, as the guns flashed again. 'Now, you see their exact position. You must take that ridge.' My reply was: 'I'll do it.' In 30 minutes after we reached the field we were storming the rock of Chickamauga. It was an awful contest up that slope, every foot of which was planted with death.

'We went in with 75000 men, and only 4000 reported for duty at the next muster. We went up, up, up till we reached the summit, and planted ourselves there to stay. It was a terribly hot place, and we made the plateau a lake of blood before we drove Hindman back. I rode back and reported to Thomas. I was bloody from head to foot. He clasped my hand, and said with great emotion: General Steedman, you have saved my army.' I got my stars not long afterward, and that's about all there was of it. Yes, it was a risk I ran, but I was right, and I knew it."

As he rode to battle that day, he met Gen. Granger, who said feelingly, "Sted, old boy, its going to be d—d hot in there. If anything should happen, have you any requests to make of me." The vein of sentiment was running deep in the questioner's heart, but the practical soldier responded in words that have since been memorable:

"Yes, Mr. Granger; if I fall in the fight please see my body decently buried and my name correctly spelled in the newspapers," and he deliberately spelled it.—Cincinnati Commercial-Gazette.

REST FOR THE WEARY.

A Remedy Recommended for Nervous Prostration.

From the Providence Journal.

There is an unusual amount of illness this Autumn of the type known, as "nervous prostration." It is prevalent among hard-worked people, who have been deprived of the needed Summer rest and relaxation, men who carry their business home with them every night, and women who are worn out by domestic cares and worries. It is very strange how much we are told about food, clothing, ventilation, drainage, exercise and other things which have an influence on our health, and how very seldom we think of rest. And yet, as a remedial and restorative measure, it is of the first importance in many cases. Most physicians know what to do and when to do it. but a good deal of common sense is required to discover how not to do something, and when to let the patient alone. A combination of drudging and fretting kills more than half the sick people in the world; a man's enemies cannot do him near so much damage as his friends. The world is possessed with the notion that when a man is taken ill, a terrible ado must be kept up, an alternation of nursing and fussing; while preternaturally wise and whispering doctors, sympathizing friends, tearful relatives and chattering nurses add their contributions to the wrong side, and all because somebody is ill and needs chiefly rest. We have not yet, most of us, gotten rid of the old notion of the ancients that disease is a personality, a something that is in the air, that travels about, enters our dwellings and finally seizes hold of us; something akin in the minds of the ignorant to a goblin ghost, fiend, demon or witch, which only pills or potations can exorcise, kill or cure. We are confident that many a sensible physician will say, if the patient will let him, that two-thirds of all the maladies of all the people in the world would get well in a few hours or days, if left to themselves, with no other appliances than such as instinct would suggest and common sense employ. But patients often estimate the doctors's skill by the wonderfully wise look which he assumes, and a sick man's friends hate to seem unsympathizing, and so are apt to be officious. It is to be understood, of course that we are not speaking of extreme cases, but of the treatment of most of the ills which flesh is heir to—the troubles which come upon overworked men and women, so many of whom we find all around us in this pushing, competitive age. Their best remedy, if they can take it, is rest. If that be impossible, we can only pity them.

CHARITY NEWTON'S MONEY.

How She Divided a Kettleful of Cash Beside Her Husband's Death-bed.

New Haven Dispatch to New York Sun.

John Newton's broad acres embrace much of the township of Ledyard Center. Now that the old man is dead, the old house in which he lived will remain untenanted. The neighboring farmers tell stories of the old man's shrewdness in lending money and shaving notes, but with all his smartness and success in piling up some $50,000 in this hard corner of a wilderness, his executors find that many of his mortgages cover land so poor as to be hardly worth the paper they are written on. The first money he earned when he was a boy for chopping wood one winter in a pine swamp he put into the New London bank, and it remained there untouched to his dying day. When last he looked it up it had increased to nearly $3,000. He had a wife but he spent little money upon her and it was to save it that he married her. Her name was Charity Vorman. Fifty years ago Charity Norman was a red cheeked tailoress of thirty. In those days country tailoresses used to go about from house to house with their work bags to stock up the men's wardrobes for the winter. Old Col. Hepthania Newton was a merry Yankee, who, unlike his son John, loved jolly company and good clothes, and Charity used to be called to his household semi-annually, and many a blue coat with silver buttons did she make for Col. Newton. While she was there one fall Col. Newton died, Everything was changed then at the Newton homestead. Charity kindly lent a hand in the house, and proved to be such a skillful housekeeper that John, who was Col. Newton's only child, persuaded her to stay and help him carry on the farm. She milked his cows, weeded his onions, made his butter and peddled his produce in Norwich for years. She was a mine of wealth and faithful to John, but in an evil day he into his head that he wanted to get rid of her. Then Charity's big brother stepped in and threatened a breach of promise suit for $800 damages if John did not marry his sister. John, after handing back a little, led her to the altar rather than part with the money. He was 40 then and she was 38. Mrs. Newton now says that he bought her only one thing during all their married life, and that was a pair of shoes.

A few days ago, when John Newton knew that his life was nearly ended, being unable to get off his bed, he sent for a Pennsylvania relative, to whom he intended to give his property, to come on an help him make his will. The man came, and while Charity was busy with her cooking, she heard enough of their talk to convince her that the poor mortgages were to be given to her as her share, and the cash was going to the Pennsylvania cousin. She resolved a bit of strategy. Going up stairs she pulled an old hair trunk out from under the eaves, and drawing it up before the garret window examined its contents. It had been John Newton's private savings bank and safe deposit vault for years. It contained $600 in old gold coin, $300 in silver and $27,000 in Government bonds and securities. Satisfying herself that it was all there, she went down stairs to her bed-room, put on her brown hood, her calf-skin shoes and and a clean apron, and started for Norwich, where she consulted a lawyer.

When she came back she proceeded to carry out the lawyer's instructions. No one but her husband knew of the whereabouts of the concealed treasure, and she feared that he might tell his cousin. So late at night she visited the chest, this time with her biggest dinner-kettle in her hand. She transferred the cash to the kettle, and, huggin the $27,000 parcel in one hand, she groped her way down the stairs in the dark, and set the kettle under the sink.

'It was the first thing I ever refused to obey Mr. Newton," she said, in relating the story. "It made me feel awful, but I had to do it. The next day Mr. Newton called out for me to bring down his money. I said to him: 'I can't do that, Mr. Newton—John.' Then I told him how poorly I should be provided for, if he died, with the old land instead of the money, and finaly he asked me how much I would withdraw all claims on his estate for. I said $15,000."

The old man was failing rapidly, the Pennsylvania cousin was becoming impatient, and his lawyer was fidgeting over the delay, but Charity made her stand and stuck to it. There was little time to talk, and they signed a paper agreeing to pay her $10,000 in cash. On receipt of this she went and brought in the dinner kettle and turned its contents on the floor. Her money was handed to her, the will was made out, and John Newton died that night.

"I signed off," said Charity' "and witnessed his will giving the rest of what I had helped him earn to his relatives out in Pennsylvania. Charity had money in her own name before, and she now has a bank account of $25,000.

MONSIGNOR CAPEL.

A Distinguished Visitor's Impressions of American Men and Children.

"Pity the sorrows of a poor old man," rang out a sonorous voice from the parlor of the residence of Mr. Peter L. Foy last evening as the announcement was made that a Globe-Democrat reporter was in waiting to see Monsignor Capel. A moment later the great ecclesiastical himself appeared with the jocose greeting, "So you have come to torment me? Well, what shall I say?"

As genial, pleasant and companiable a man as one could meet; a laughing eye, which can grow severe at times; a clear-cut face, not too prominent nose, fine head, handsome mouth, the profile rather of the Italian than the native Englishman; a form of somewhat more than medium height, inclined to obesity; these are the outward characteristics of the famous churchman visitor to St. Louis. His face and general bearing betray conscious power, yet affability to every one he meets is his greatest charm.

The reporter had ample opportunity to observe closely the remarkable man whose fame is world-wide. Easy in conversation, he evidently delights to talk, as his auditors are delighted to listen. His observations and criticisms upon men and things are peculiar and pleasing. As to his impressions of America, he frankly says he has none to give. "I will wait until I have seen more of the country, and then give my impressions when I get back to England."

"You will remain in this country for some time, then?"

"Yes. My leave has been extended, and I will remain in the United States until next May."

"Have you realized your expectations of your visit to this country?"

"I have always had a very warm side for the American people. I can say I love them. At the time of the beginning of your civil war I was at Pau, in southern France, where I met many from the United States, mainly Southerners, I also had many American boys for pupils and learned to like them. They were manly, generous and truthful. Whenever they give me their word I could rely upon it implicitly. I have always been treated so kindly by Americans that I have a very warm side for them. For more than twenty years I have had intimate relations with many of them, and I find a refinement, a delicacy, a generosity existing in their character which many foreigners have failed to acknowledge."

Referring to impressions he continued, "I have made but one statement since I have been here, and that was at a private house, where I thought my utterances could not possibly reach the press. I was talking to some young men, and told them the great mistake they made was not in educating themselves more thoroughly. The women of this country are better educated than the men, and this can but have a baneful effect. Poland is a historical example of it. It is the cause of more divorces in your country than anything else. Your young men go to work at 16 Their sisters do not marry at 16, nor 17; they begin to marry at 18. They do not sit twirling their fingers all the time. They read and improve their minds, and read works their brothers are too tired to peruse when they come home from work. The sisters marry some good fellow who has an income of $5,000 or $6,000 a year, for in marryingso they know they can secure the comforts of life. The husband is thoroughly good-hearted and generous, but that is not all a woman wants. She wants refinement and culture as well. Her husband is not her equal. No nation can survive where the women are better educated than the men."

"There is a peculiarity I have noticed here," he went on, changing the subject, "and that is, there are no children in the United States. They are little men and women. Precocity you would call it. I love children and never fail to talk to them. The children here talk like old people, dress in furbelows and jewelry, just as if they had come out of a Paris shop, and act like grown people. It is the strength and glory of England that children are children up to at least 16 years of age."

"You find a vast difference between England and America, in more ways than one, do you not?

"A very great difference. There is a sense of roominess here that is exhilarating. Every thing is big. Look at these rooms. Each one is large enough for several people to live in. That is the way with your country. There is a sense of freedom everywhere."—St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

Personal Matters.

General William Randal Smith, one of the best-known lawyers in the state of Connecticut, died recently very sudly of apoplexy, at Norwalk. He was formerly a brigadier general of Connecticut National Guard, and was counsel for Buchholz, now serving a life sentence in state's prison for the murder of John H. Shutte, a wealthy German at South Norwalk.

The wedding ring given by Martin Luther to his bride is still in existence. and has been lately placed on exhibition at Frankfort-on-the-Main. It bears a representation of Christ upon the cross and the instruments of the passion, and in it is set a small ruby. The inscription is, "Dr. Martin Luther; Catherine Bora, June 13, 1525."

Lawrence Barrett, the actor closed a nine week's engagement in New York the other evening, and in response to calls by the audience made a speech from the stage, in which he recommended Henry Irving to their patronage, and hoped his own foreign tour would be successful. The engagement just ended, it is claimed, nets Mr. Barrett about $40,000.

Mr. Blaine gets from the publishers of his new book $75,000 cash down and a royalty of 15 cents a volume There are advance orders for 100,000 copies. and it is expected that fully 300,000 will be sold. This would yield the author $120,000 in all.

Mrs. Southworth, the story-writer, still lives in Washington, where she was a school teacher thirty-five yerrs ago. Her home "Prospect Cottage," is embowered in honeysuckles, and occupies a commanding position overlooking the city.

The number of wealthy members of Congress increasus. Col. Lyman, of Massachusetts, is one of the new members who will entertain elaborately this winter. He inherited great wealth. Washburn, of Minnesota has rented Don Cameron's house, and will give lavish receptions. Of the new senators nearly all are rich. Bowen, of Colorado, is a mining lord. Sabin, of Minnesota, went from Connecticut twenty years ago, and is now very rich. Dolph, of Oregon, is a thrifty corporation attorney. Colquitt is one of the best to do men in Georgia, and Gibson. of Louisiana, inherited wealth. There are not many poor men left in the senate. Count out Blair, Frye, Kenna, Jones, of Florida, and Riddleberger, and the rest are accounted rich.

The appearance of Pere Hyacinthe is very striking, and his smooth, broad, intellectual face reminds one strongly of Henry Ward Beecher in its general outline. He talks nothing but French, although formerly he passed a good deal of his time in this country, where he wooed and won his wife, and thus placed a chasm between himself and the Roman Church which nothing could bridge.

William Porton, who was born on the English man-of-war Saturn on August 12, 1783, who joined the navy as a youth and stood close to Nelson when he received his mortal wound in the battle of Trafalgar, has just died at Wolverhampton, where he had earned a livelihood for more than sixty years. The Globe adds that he died in the workhouse, a touching illustration of how "English delights in honoring her heroes, especially her naval heroes, being mistress of the sea."

A German statistician has calculated the chance which a leading actress has of establishing herself well in life by marrying into royal or noble families. The results show that she has one chance in 846 of becoming the consort of a Prince belonging to a reigning family, one in 405 of becoming the wife of a second rate or younger brother Prince, one in 512 of shuffling off her mortal coil in the capacity of a Duchess, one in 200 of breathing her last as a Countess, and one in 170 of dying a Baroness, if she is out and out "killing."

Miss Dickinson's dresses in Anne Boylen are spoken of as "marvels of art." The first is a white satin with a front of solid crystal embroidery, trimmings of crystal fringe, and a court train of dark blue velvet. Then she wears a canary-colored moire antique, with a very dark crimson velvet front with interlacings of gold over it, and golden tassels depending from the openings, the corsage being trimmed to match. The third is a heavy silk of a very light terra-cotta shade approaching pink, with a beautiful front of flowered stripes that are marvels of beauty as the lights and shades fall upon them. The fourth is a robe of crimson velvet and white ermine in which she looks indeed a very queen. The fifth and last is a black velvet.

Last week Marshall H. Mallory, of the Madison Square theater, went over from New York to Philadelphia to visit his brother, the Rev. Dr. Mallory, editor of the Churchman, who is in Philadelphia during the Episcopal convention. At the Hotel Alden he met a beautiful and accomplished young lady whose personal and social graces quite charmed him. One evening he invited her to accompany him to see the "Queen's Lace Handkerchief," one of the sprightliest of modern comic operas. "Oh, Mr. Mallory," exclaimed the fair creature, "I'm so disappointed, but I have another engagement for this evening. I'd give anything to see it—I don't know she had it on exhibition here."

Poets and Prose Writers.

Lord Coleridge to the students of Haverford College, Philadelphia.

In your studies, my first counsel is that you attend carefully and faithfully to your prescribed course. And then, outside of your studies, let me earnestly recommend to you that you learn by heart such passages as strike you as great or beautiful in the best poetry or prose. First, always, Shakspere, an inexhaustible storehouse of wisdom, instruction and exquisite diction. Then Milton, one of the best masters for an orator. Mr. Bright—I do not say the greatest orator of our generation, but if there be a greater orator I never heard him—told me that he had built himself up upon Milton; and if you watch his words and the structure of his sentences as he speaks, you will see how they are pervaded by the spirit of this great poet, and how, though he does not imitate Milton, he speaks after Milton. Then Wordsworth—And if I have any fault to find with America it is that I fear you do not do Wordsworth quite the honor which he deserves—the poet of nature and of lofty spiritual thought.

And then there is one who wrote too little, but every word he did write is precious, whose poetry I want you to get by heart, and that is Gray. There is in him the perfection of diction and melody. Then a poet whom I admired very much in college, and have always admired as a poet, though there was much in the life of the man, and some things in his writings which are by no means to be commended, Shelly. Then the poet on whom the best subsequent poetry has been built, the true master of Tennyson, a man of the richest fancy and most exquisite diction, John Keats. I beg you to learn by heart his "Hyperion," his "Ode to a Nightingale," and "Ode on a Grecian Urn." You may be surprised at the name I shall select from your American poets when I tell you to learn Byrant. I do not say Longfellow, because, although he is a sweet and noble and delightful poet, he is not American, I mean that his poetry might as well have been written in England, or Italy, or Germany, or France, as in America, but Mr. Bryant's poetry is full of characteristics of his own country, as well as noble, natural and invigorating.

And now for the press writers; I shall show my own idiosyncrasy when I name at the head of my list Lord Bolingbroke as a writer of the most perfect English, rising at times to a nervous and sideway eloquence, and falling with his subject, but never below the tone of the conversation of a high-bred gentleman. Next, I place the greatest advocate since Cicero—and I say this even remembering your own Webster,—Lord Erskine. You will find nowhere better English than in some of his sentences. Then Burke, of whom Erskine himself spoke so highly. Then Hooker, whom I should not recommend to be read as a whole, except by theological students; but he has written some passages which cannot be surpassed. Then that great man, Lord Bacon, with words of exactest choice and profoundest wisdom, whom I cannot forbear quoting, although he will make my own words poor and worthless in the comparison.

And next I shall name a man who had great influence upon me at Oxford, and who, in spite of his change of religion, remains to be one of the greatest masters of English, Cardinal Newman. You do not know the full extent of the resources of our language if you have not read some of the best works of Newman. And now I will take two of your own writers. First, Daniel Webster, a man, the majesty of whose presence I well remember, for he visited my father, and I had the honor of having him take me by the hand, and of speaking to him, or rather of being spoken to by him, as a boy. I learned many passages from him in my boyhood, which I remember still, from an old two-volume edition of his speeches, the larger collection, edited by Mr. Everett, had not yet been published. Study Webster. And next I will mention your greatest writer, the master of an exquisite and an absolutely perfect style, Nathaniel Hawthorne.

Then to name the great Greek and Latin masters. I do not know how far you study them here, but I was brought up upon them, and a great part of the literature which I committed to memory in my youth was from their writings. There was a time, doubtless, when they were too exclusively studied. Doubtless too, there were second rate, third rate, and even fourth rate authors who wrote in those languages, and whose works have been collected and commented upon by able editors. But as masters of literature the trusty great classic writers are simply perfect. And of those of whom you should study and learn by heart I will name five: First, certainly Homer; second, as certainly, Virgil; then Euripides; then Catullos; then Horace.

I cannot too earnestly recommend your acquainting yourself with good books. They are the best of companions. In sickness, in misfortune, in sorrow, in sleepless nights and days of pain, you will find your memories of great and wholesome literature a constant solace and refreshment. And, as a man is known by the company he keeps, still more truly is he known by the books he reads and loves. Read only the best books, and never read bad books. Good books will nerve you for for the work—the serious and earnest work—which is the lot of all good and true men.

And one word more, as I counsel you to earnest and faithful lives. See to it that you preserve your moral purity. Do not believe those who tell you that such an achievement is impossible in this world. It is perfectly possible, as many have proved. And nothing will so help you to it, nothing will tend more to keep you from evil, than the company of good books and the thoughts and counsels of good men.

She New How to Shingle.

From the Lewiston (Me.) Journal.

The antagonist of modern advanced education, if there be any, should have heard a little lecture that a gentleman gave on the street the other morning. The question had arisen as to the tendency of modern advanced education to create a disgust for natural labor. The gentleman told an anecdote. A young lady who was very well known in Lewiston and Auburn, and who had a liberal education in America, a course of study in the German schools, and who has since taught in some of the leading schools of this state and others, came home to her father's farm this summer. The hours hung rather heavily. "Father, our office needs shingling," said she one day. The next day the shingles were on the spot, and the young lady proposed to have some fun, and combined it in a legitimate way with solid work. She built the stagings geometrically, ran the lines after Euclid, and shingled the offices as neatly and expeditiously as the village professor of shingles himself could have done. She pulled down the staging and erected it again over the ell of the house, and in spite of paternal injunction, shingled the ell and a sloping shed attached. She practised music for pleasure in the meantime, however, and read German for a pastime. "Nothing," added the gentleman "would go further from her own inclination than notoriety."

ADDRESS TO A SEA BIRD.

Oh, wild wave wanderer,
Precipice ponderer,
Haunter of heaven and searcher of seas,
Storm scorner, thunder born,
Through clouds asunder torn,
Thou not for wonder born,
Heedless of horror, with sickle-like ease
Cuttest thy silent swarth,
Fierce, unafraid.
When the fierce-quivering lightning-sting, shivering,
Darts to the dark earth
The snake of its blade.
Polar snows snow on thee,
Tropic winds blow on thee,
Tempest and terror are stung with delight;
Ocean's broad billows
To thee are thy pillows,
Vast hollowed heaven thy chamber at night;
Sunrise and moonrise and wildering waters,
Midnight's pale shadows, the cloud's silver daughters,
All gaze upon thee and envy thy flight:
Freedom itself in its perilous height
Cries he is mine in his mien and his might!

JERRY'S MORTGAGE.

Mrs. Deane put the finishing touches to her tempting little supper table (set for three), tucked Cissy's napkin around her neck, and lifted her into her high chair, then stopped to the wide, cool doorway to watch for her husband. He came in sight ere long, walking wearily and slowly, as if the fair summer picture of mountains and green fields gleamed upon eyes too sad to drink in their beauty and significance. A man certainly not old in years, but with lines of care about his temples, and a painful droop to the mobile, sensitive mouth, which showed a harassing anxiety—a constant, daily struggle with fate. His wife walked down the grassy garden path, and took his hand in hers:

"You are over-tired, Jerry. I have a nice supper for you, and Cissy is full of cunning little ways to-night. Cheer up, dear."

He looked down with a sorrowful smile, and put his arm around her. "I am tired to-night, Louie,—tired and discouraged. I have been to Cyrus once more, but—"

His voice broke, and Louie clasped his hand more firmly, and raised it to her lips:—

"Never mind telling me, my dear. I can guess it. He is determined to foreclose the mortgage?"

"Yes."

She walked silently up and down the path with him.

"My own brother, Louie! It does seem as if he might give us another chance, but you know how he is about money. Since he married that second wife of his he seems harder than ever. Honest he is—no man could ever say that Cyrus wronged him of a cent, but—war to the knife to get his own!"

They entered the kitchen, where Cissy was beating a drum solo on her tin plate, and casting eager glances at the plate of fresh gingerbread. "Papa's baby," said Jerry, and bent down to kiss her. He sighed heavily as he took his seat, while a tear stole down his cheek.

"Ugly man—to make my papa cry," said Cissy, doubling up her small fist, "I—I—jes' kill him!"

The four-years-old tot had gathered enough from her parents' daily conversation to know that they were in some trouble connected with "a man" whom she remembered to have seen a few days before at their house. He had talked loudly and fast, and the mental photograph left on the waxen tablet of that infant soul would have made an angel weep.

"Hush-sh, Cissy. Mamma's daughter mustn't talk so. She should be a gentle little girl!" and Louie stroked the little fist till it slowly uncurled.

"Martin Best told me to-day that Cyrus has just bought another yoke of oxen, and a $200 buggy!" said Jerry, bitterly, as he took a forced swallow of tea.

"Well," said his wife, "It can't be helped, dear. But don't let us cherish hatred, or say anything we may be sorry for. I know it's hard—it's hard!" and her lips quivered, as she looked around the neat, home-like kitchen, and glanced beyond it to the vine-wreathed window of the bed-room where her baby's eyes had first opened to the light. "You know different people have different make-ups." A great sob rose in her throat,—she gave one look at Cissy—struggled to restrain her feelings, but the flood-tide of grief must have way, and, rushing to Jerry, she clasped her arms about his neck, and burst into tears, just as a shadow fell across the door-way, and a visitor entered.

* * * * * * * *

In the morning sunshine, in the corner of a flourishing field near a thrifty-looking white frame house surrounded by substantial outbuildings, a man with a bushy red beard, and small, weasel-like, gray eyes, was hoeing corn. He was so busy that he neither saw nor heard the approach of footsteps to the fence.

"Cyrus Deane, do you know that you're a-sendin' your own soul right strat to perdition?"

He looked up, startled. A tall, gaunt female was peering at him from a pair of glistening spectacles,—a woman in a rusty black dress, and a straw "shaker" trimmed with a bombazine cape, and a single bow of black ribbon. It was Miss Mahala Truffett. She was that universal village character of whom the weak and vicious so justly stand in awe,—a woman who speaks her mind,—and a very startling way she had of doing it. Being possessed of considerable property, and social position, she was allowed to exercise her privilege to her heart's content. A tongue like forked lightning, when occasion required, but a heart o'erflowing with love for the struggling and suffering. Cyrus Deane shifted his hoe uneasily. "I don't see heow you make it eout thet I'm agoin' any faster'n other folks. I hain't done nothin' to disobleege you thet I know of."

"You know what I mean. I was up to Jerry's last night." She gave him another steady look from those Rhadamanthus-like glasses. His gaze fell before hers.

"I hain't pizened none o' Jerry's critters, nor sot his barn afire, hev I?"

"You've pizened his peace o' mind. You've wore him eout with worry, till he's a walkin' ghost. I set great store by Louisy Ann, I do, and when I see her a-gittin' that fit o' highstericks last night all along o' your hardness and scrinchin' meanness, I come as nigh bilin' over as ever I did in my life! Your own brother, Cyrus Deane! The little curly-headed chap that like enough, slep' on the same pillow with you many a night. What would your mother ha' thought, ef she'd ha' known heow different you'd turn out?"

Cyrus Dean drew down his bushy eye brows, and gave an energetic kick to a small bowlder.

"Jerry's hed ez good a chance to git along ez me. We started even. It's his own look-eout! He hain't no hand to manage,—never was,—never could git fore-handed in his born days!"

"The more reason why you ought to be merciful. He hain't hed ez good a chance ez you. The year that your barns was groanin' an' runnin' over, his wheat got the weevil, an' his corn ketched the mildew. His cattle died, an' his tools was stole. He laid sick with rheumatic fever, and hed a doctor's bill of $90 to pay. Do you call that ez good a chance ez yours? Louisy Ann works ez hard ez any woman—cookin', an' cleanin', an' grubbing—an' never hed the fust scrap o' hired help, 'cept for 'leven days when Cissy was a baby—an' she never gits a ride in a bran new buggy, nuther!" casting a keen glance toward the wagon-shed.

Cyrus mopped his beaded brow with a red cotton handkerchief, and took up his hoe with a determined air, as if to end the conference.

"I hain't ben harf as hard on him ez some folks would ha' ben. I've gin him time, an' gin him time, till my patience is clean tuckered eout, an' he keeps a-fallin' behind instid o' gittin' forrard. He's younger'n I be, he kin go West!"

Miss Mahala took off her "shaker," and shook out the cape, straightened out the bow, and set it on her head again, and then said, in slow, measured tones:—

"May the Lord hev mercy on your soul, Cyrus Deane! Ef he measured it eout to you ez you do to other folks, you'd hev precious little to be thankful fer."

She walked slowly down the road, and Cyrus went on with his hoeing. He didn't consider himself a hard man. Honest, outwardly he was, as Jerry had said, but "war to the knife to get his own." In two short weeks he could foreclose the mortgage, and Jerry's little place would be his own. Would he do it? Miss Mahala's words were verjuice to his conscience—for a brief minute nobler feelings strove with his greed of gain, then, dashing down the hoe:

"No! Gosh durn it! Jerry's got to look eout for himself. He's a grown man—not a baby! Why can't thet cussed old vinegar-face mind her own business?"

In the afternoon he drove to the next town in his new buggy. A little flossy haired girl ran out from a nook in the woods and cried:

"Man—man—take me a little ride; do, please."

He reined up the horse, and helped the little creature in. Cyrus Deane had one soft spot in his heart—it was for little tiny children. No prattling lips had ever called him "father." It would have been better for those he had to deal with had it been otherwise.

"And whose little gal be you, pray, out here in these woods alone?" he asked.

"I'm Cissy Deane, and mamma lets me go to the big rock by myself, 'cause I know the way." She looked up and gave a little howl. "Let me out! Oh, let me out! You're a bad, dreadful man! You're the man that made my papa cry!"

She scrambled down, and shaking her tiny fist at the buggy, stamped her foot, and ran away.

A bitter look came into Cyrus Dean's face. "My own brother's youngster—an' I never would ha' knowed her ef she hadn't told me her name. She'll hate me, too, like as not!"

He whipped up his horse, and drove on rapidly. Fate seemed determined to thrust the mortgage business in his face at every turn. He had two weeks before him. He could change his mind whenever he chose. Should he do it?

* * * * * * * *

Cyrus Deane and his wife were eating their early breakfast, next morning, when Miss Mahala gave a short knock at the kitchen door, then, according to the prevailing custom, opened it and walked in. With a rather grim "good morning" to Cyrus and a stiffish nod to Mrs. Deane number two, who handed her a chair, she proceeded at once to the business that had brought her there.

"Heow much 'll you give for that big blackberry lot o' mine, Cyrus Deane, south of Anthony Woods' place?"

Cyrus looked surprised, 'Why, what be you wantin' to sell that blackb'ry lot for?'

"That's jest the dentikil question. Sposin' I dew want to sell it, what will I sell it for? In other words, what 'll you buy it for?

Cyrus Deane's little gray eyes twinkled. His vulpine instincts scented a bargain. He hemmed and hawed:—

"Waal—now—come to think on't th'ain't much good in a blackb'ry lot. You carnt keep the pesky boys off of it to save yer life!"

"E you couldn't scare 'em off, I don't know who could," said Miss Mahala, with a snap. "It's splendid land. You could plow 'em under, and raise 'most anyth'n' on it. I hain't had much time to bother with it, lately, so it's laid there, and laid there. Thur's one or two ben askin' me 'bout it."

"Yaas—yaas!" said Cyrus, and hitched in his chair.

Miss Mahala was silent. She felt sure of her man.

Cyrus pushed away his plate, and moved back from the table. His wife began to clear off the dishes.

"Sposin' you struck a party thet wanted it, heow much 'ud you take for it, did you say?"

"I didn't say. I asked how much you'd give me for it."

Cyrus reached out his horny hand, and pulled a splinter from the broom that hung near.

"Waal—now!" picking his teeth, "'taint likely anybuddy 'ud give you more'n a hundred dollars fer it. Would you sell for that?"

"Of course not," said Miss Mahala promptly, "it's worth jest double—every cent of it."

"Thun—" began Cyrus, and knit his brows.

"It will be a building lot some day, when the village grows. Then who-ever owned it could get $500 for it, easy," said Miss Mahala.

"Why don't you hold on tew it, then?" asked Cyrus, quickly.

"Because I'd rather sell it now," and Miss Mahala snapped the clasp of her old-fashioned reticule hanging on her arm.

"I couldn't give $200 for it, no way at all. Would you take $150?"

"Call it $175, and it's a bargain. John Haley 'ud jump at it ef he could git it at that price."

Cyrus threw down the broom splinter and reached for another.

"Remember, in a few years you will git $500 for it!"

"I maught,—and then agin I maughtent," said Cyrus, then suddenly slapping his knee, "Waal—call it a trade at $175! Do ye want it all to-day, cash down?"

"I don't want any cash at all. I'll give you a deed o' the lot, an' $125 in cash, besides, of you'll trade me—"

The conclusion of her sentence had the effect of an electric shock on her auditor.

"Thun—you don't mean it! What in kingdom be yau a thinkin' of, to take holt o' sech a resky piece o' proputty ez that!"

"I haint afeard o' the resk," said Miss Mahala, drawing forth a roll of greenbacks from her reticule.

The bargain was made. They went to the squire's to have a deed made out, and as Miss Mahala's stiff, straight figure disappeared down the road, a crafty smile crept over Cyrus Deane's face, and he slowly ejaculated:

"Of—all—the—tarnel—fools—on the face of the airth—the tarnalest is a woman—when she sets eout to transact biznes!"

A few hours later, Miss Mahala stepped softly across the threshold of Jerry Deane's home.

"I hain't forgot that this is Cissy's birthday. I've fetched her a little present," setting a plate on the table. "Tain't much to brag of, only a loaf o' 'lection cake, but Timothy Meadowses wife (she 'twas 'Liza Blynn) used to 'low that I was the beatenest hand at 'lection cake that she ever see. I don't say it to to boast. Go on with your dinner. I've et mine."

She gave Sissy a loving hug, and helped herself to a chair, receiving Mrs. Deane's thanks with a "Sho, 'taint nuthin' to speak of,—only I thought I'd jest like to celebrate. Cissy's a portickler pet o' mine, you know."

After a pause, she continued: "By the way, Louisy, Ann, you'd better put it on another platter. It's ben on that one so long it's got all sweated down!"

As Mrs. Deane lifted it she discovered a folded paper underneath. "What's this?" she exclaimed in surprise.

"Jess open it an' see," and Miss Mahala. "Didn't I tell you I wanted to celebrate?" and the Rhadamanthus glasses grew suspiciously cloudy.

"Jerry! Oh, Jerry! It's the mortgage! How ever did you get hold of it, Miss Mahala?"

"That's my affair," said Miss Mahala. "The only difference is that you kin pay it to me instid o' Cyrus—an' you kin take your own time to it, Jerry. I know what kind o' stuff Louisy Ann's made of. She'd work herself to a shadder to get it paid off, ef I let her. But I tell you once for all, I don't cal'late tew."

Years later, when in the inexorable retribution of events, Cyrus Deane, by a peculiar succession of calamities, was rendered a homeless and ruined man, it was his brother's roof that sheltered him and his—it was his brother's hand that bestowed the wherewithal to start anew—it was his brother's hope and courage that warded off despair, and saved him from a suicidal grave. More than this—it was his brother's voice that turned him, late though it was from the paths of greed,—his brother's influence that sowed in the long neglected garden of his soul the seeds that make for loving kindness, peace and good-will to men. He lives to-day,—a childless man still,—but every youngster in the village calls him "Uncle Cyrus,"—and no man or woman is afraid to seek a favor at his hands.

Luther Anniversary.

Berlin Cable: The festival in celebration of the fourth centenary of Luther's birth takes place next Saturday at Eiselben. It promises unusual splendor, the preparations being made on an extensive scale. Along the principal streets throughout which the grand procession will pass the houses will be decorated with flags, carpets, garlands and evergreens. The preparations for the historic procession are now complete. The spectacle promises extraordinary magnificence. Eight hundred persons will take part. Five hundred will be in medieval costumes of historic accuracy, all more or less remarkable for style and color. There will also be 120 horses brilliantly caparisoned in the fashion of the middle ages. The principal personages in the procession will appear in costumes of gorgeous descriptions. The line of the procession will be kept by the members of seventy-two veteran societies, representing a body of 2,000 men in their respective uniforms. The crown prince of Germany will arrive on the 8th and be welcomed on the evening of the festival by 2,000 miners in characteristic costumes, with a torchlight procession.

A whole nation of housekeepers have been using Dr. Price's Cream Baking Powder for years, and has proven it pure, effective and healthful. They know it to be the best baking powder, for they have tried it well and it has never failed them. This is knowledge gained by experience in the kitchen in actual use.

Her Legs Are Queer.

Physicians of Milwaukee are studying the case of a girl thirteen years old, whose legs below the knees are so sensitive that they cannot be touched between daybreak and midnight, but at 12, midnight, become so insensible to feeling that the strongest current of electricity has no effect upon them. She walks and runs about at play in the day time, but if she strikes any object she is thrown into paroxysms of agony. While the lower part of her legs are in this condition, her legs from the knees up are completely dead. The disease came on a year ago. She is strong and healthy, except for cataleptic convulsions. Prominent physicians of other cities have examined the case, but failed to effect a cure.

Young man, you can make no better investment than to take the thorough course of training at H. B. Bryant's Chicago Business College. It will pay.

ARIADNE.

She stood on the sands of the shelving shore
(The summer blooms and the autumn glows),
And the languor of loving her eyes down-bore
For the ever gone—and the never more
(For the autumn reaps and the summer sows).

Afar o'er the Orient ocean gleams
(The summer blooms and the autumn glows),
Love like a vanishing vision seems
Sailing to distance dim of dreams
(For the autumn reaps and the summer sows).

With the hate of love, and the love of hate
(The summer blooms and the autumn glows),
She murmuring moans—Too late! too late!
For woman is wonted to wail and wait
(While the autumn reaps and the summer sows).

A perfume pierced with a breath and bloom
(The summer blooms and the autumn glows),
And lo! at her side in a glimmering gloom
A God—and Love was no longer doom
(For the autumn reaps and the summer sows).

WHAT WOMEN WANT TO KNOW.

Hats.

Among the round hats for winter use are two shapes which promise to be more worn than any others. One of these has a high crown and a small brim in front and on the sides. The back of the brim turns up. The other hat has a round crown and a small brim, which leaves the nape of the neck uncovered in the back. The brim extends slightly over the eyes in front, like a jockey's cap. The trimming for this shape generally consists of a bunch of ostrich tips placed in front a little to the left. Another style is the Louis XI. hat, trimmed with an ornamental buckle and a deep band of velvet. Gainsborough and Rembrandt hats have been quite abandoned for the present. A black or dark-colored felt hat with a high crown is trimmed with a twisted piece of white "crepon" and a bird of paradise. Small capotes are still much worn in Paris. They are of colored chenille, light colored, fancy and plain velvets, shirred velvet, tulle "crepon," and Parisian embroidery. A new shaped hat is much raised from the head in front, and has the outside of the brim covered with chenille arranged like lat ice-work. The crown is of soft velvet. A stamp of novelty is given to this bonnet by a small piece of white lace, which is sewed on the inside where the bonnet is raised and gathered, to fall flat against the hair. In the center, between the brim and lace, is a small butterfly bow of narrow colored ribbon. On the outside of the brim is a bunch of ostrich tips. When modistes introduced animals of various kinds to serve as bonnet trimmings they were not particularly successful in their choice. The effect of a tiny chicken, with few feathers, a large head, thin claws, and small stripped wings spread over a felt hat cannot be pleasing. Nor is an ugly green lizard, or even a kitten's head, a fitting ornament for a lady's bonnet. Some capotes and round hats are surrounded by robin redbreasts, arranged in close lines like ropes of onions. As the beautiful velvet flowers now made are so much more desirable for this purpose, it is almost certain that as the season advances most bonnets will have the latter trimming. Velvet flowers, such as pansies, heliotropes, roses and hyacinths, combined with ferns, leaves, sprays of red roses and white lilacs, will serve both for bonnets and dresses.

Gray.

Gray, there is no doubt, will continue to be the fashionable color this winter. Gray, tender, melancholy, severe, Quaker, silver, dove, nun's, with its creamy sheen—gray in all tones and shades, from the somewhat dingy tint, very appropriately called "London smoke," to the pretty bluish gray christened by the French people "pschutt." Every day seems to add another tint and another name to the list of grays. "Crepuscule" is said to be the last shade, though, no doubt, while this fact is being chronicled some enterprising chemist or manufacturer is mixing a little more "smoke" color and a little less blue in his dye, and is looking through his French dictionary to find another name to call it by. Everybody, just now that the skies are sullen and sad, and the weather chilly, is wearing a gray walking garb of some sort, thus adding to the neutrality of things in general, instead of mitigating the prevailing drabness peculiar to the late autumn season by donning the brightest of colors. This fashionable fancy is, however, quite as inexplicable as was that of wearing crushed strawberry and scarlet last summer, when the thermometer stood at ninety-five in the shade. Among other gray tints is a very ugly one about the color of zinc. This most unbecoming, most "trying" of shades, is, for some reason past finding out, the one chosen by brides in general for either wedding or traveling dress. Nobody short of a Venus can put on a zinc-colored dress and expect to look pretty in it. Women with rich brown hair and a clear milk-and-rose complexion pass muster in it, but nine out of ten look as if in the last stages of malaria or the jaundice.

Walking Dresses.

Visiting and walking suits are still made with round, short skirts, and trains are reserved for very ceremonious occasions. For example, an evening toilet of light pink crepe de Chine has a slightly puffed round skirt, which falls over two pink satin plaitings. The polonaise may be of plain pink fabric or of cherry color and pink combined. The back forms the puffing, and, if necessary, the train. The polonaise may be replaced by a pointed waist of a chestnut-brown brocaded satin, with flat paniers of the brown satin arranged over full paniers of pink satin which fall below. This brown brocade is much combined with pink goods. Gray toilets retain favor. Some of these are in one shade of gray, the only contrast being in the combining of fabrics with and without gloss. Others are in light and dark grays, gray and brown, or gray and Pompadour goods. Very pretty fancy suits are to be seen in the latter combinations. They have plaited skirts, with the plaits about one inch deep, alternating in gray "moire" and cherry and pink Pompadour on a gray ground. There is made for wear with this skirt a plain gray moire polonaise, which opens and turns back on either side to form two large Pompadour revers. The elbow sleeves have Pompadour trimmings. The gray "moire" plastron is worked with steel and ruby beads. The collar is embroidered to match. Around the polonaise is a trimming of gray lace worked with steel beads. This style of dress may also combine navy blue and Pompadour fabrics. The plaits on the skirt are disposed as described, while the upper part may consist of a tunique, with long square panel ends of plain blue material. The drapery and basque are trimmed with points of blue goods. The Fedora trimming down the front of the waist forms a double puffing; one is blue, the other Pompadour.

Sandals and Shoes.

Roman and Egyptian sandals are very much in favor now for dressy house wear. The Egyptian style has the diminutive toe covered with an embroidery in vari-colored beads; some designs showing tiny palms in brilliant hues. The Roman sandal is strapped over the high instep, the three straps being fastened by silver buckles, with Roman medallions in the center of each, made of real silver. A new sandal called the Fedora is made of fine black undressed kid, the toes being covered with ruby and jet beads. These are lined with dark red satin, and fastened over the instep with cut jet buckles. The Dieppe slipper of black satin is cut very low indeed, and is exclusively designed for the full display of costly embroidered and lace-finished hose. Dark red slippers, made of alligator skin, to be worn with black silk hose, are designed for boudoir wear, as are also new half-shoes made of doe-colored undressed kid, to be worn with pale blue or mauve stockings. The Richelieu shoe, with brown cloth tops and bronze foxings, is very fashionably worn with brown-colored costumes, and for general wear are shown a number of handsome models made severally in shapes known as Louis XIV., Moliere, Queen Anne, Spanish arch, Chinese and "common sense." Cloth matched to the costume is much liked for the tops of walking shoes, the foxings being of kid, either black or bronze. These are made with rounded toes and a modified French heel.

The Wooden Mantel.

The modern mantel and its decorations are an important feature of the parlor. The woodwork may or may not match the wood of the furniture; this is a matter of taste. As a rule it forms a sort of bric-a-brac cabinet above the mantel, and a frame-work for the beveled mirror at its back. This woodwork shows the same elaborate carving that characterizes the funiture. A pleasing over-mantel is modeled after what manufacturers are pleased to call the "early American style." It consists in a shelf with rounding corners and near the center are delicate posts supporting a smaller shelf above, both being protected by a slender railing. A panel-like mirror is introduced above the lower self. Then there are German renaissance mantels made in ebonized cherry that have a decidedly solid and medieval style. As regards the bric-a-brac, porcelains, pictures and ornaments which decorate the parlor, it must be said, in nine cases out of ten, these are deposited in numbers so great as to give a sense of crowding. Nor is this all. The ornaments are not only present in too great numbers, but there is no attempt to harmony; hence articles beautiful in themselves are at war with uncongenial neighbors, and the result is exceedingly wearisome. Unless a room is very large, only a few rare ornaments are required. These should be choice and care observed not to belittle them by association with showy but cheap bric-a-brac.

Ornaments.

Very handsome ornaments are used on the new cloaks—some of cut steel, others of irridescent metal or antique bronze, while the newest and most recherche of all are of carved wood, light or dark, black, yellow, ecru, red or brown. Birds' heads, dragons, griffins, the heads of animals, such as foxes, horses, dogs, etc., are favorite fancies for these. Very elegant evening wraps are of Oriental brocade, woven in imitation of Indian shawls. On some costly mantles the trimming is a wide border cut from a Cashmere Valley shawl, which border nearly covers the plush or velvet foundation of the mantle. Thus, on a dolman of dull red velvet, from Pingat, the sleeves, the fronts and the skirt are all edged by such a bordering, some eight or ten inches wide, and the same trimming is set down the back, leaving but little of the velvet visible. A thick ruche of shaded gray cock's feathers completes the garniture and a handsome carved wood ornament is at the throat. Another evening wrap from Pingat is a color study in wood browns and sapphire blues, the design being a large velvet arabesque brocaded on an uncut velvet ground, and the trimming chenille fringe in all the colors of the wrap.

The Fern Easel.

There is no design more graceful for growing ferns or vines in the drawing-room than an easel of bamboo, so slitted at short distances that little pans may be inserted in the hollow wood. These can be filled with soil and planted with fanciful growth, mosses, ferns, or vines, which will grow until the bamboo is covered, and perchance the picture on the picture on the easel charmingly draped.

The little pans of ferns, rock moss, swamp moss and wood moss, with pitcher plant, pine branches, snake root, fungi, wintergreen, woodberries, wild cranberries and acorns, called "Boston ferneries," are arriving in unusual beauty. To scour the woods for the filling of fern pans provides delightful recreation for children. It sets on a gilded basket, they make a beautiful centerpiece for the table. To keep these fresh during the entire winter, they should be soaked daily in water, being then drained by tipping the pan.

The Spanish Mantle.

The new "Spanish mantle," which is to take the place of the hackneyed fur-lined circular with those who seek for novelty in attire, is very becoming to tall, slender ladies. This wrap is uncommonly elegant and graceful, and is made of black brocaded velvet, and trimmed around the entire garment with black Russian fox. Around the neck is a very deep collar of the same fur, which covers the shoulders like a cape. The wrap is lined with dark red plush, and is much too heavy for street wear, being designed especially for carriage use, and as a garment to be thrown aside in a heated room. Models much in the same style for promenade wear are made of brocaded satin or velvet, lined with quilted satin, and trimmed with chenille fringes, fur or ziblinette.

She Had Enough.

A well known and highly respected young lady of Columbus, Ohio, became stage-struck last week, and made application to join a company playing there. The manager determined to teach the young lady a lesson, and, therefore, provided her with a very abbreviated costume. She donned them boldly enough, but when it came to going before the audience her heart quailed, and she did not stop long enough to don her own garments, but broke out at the back door, and never stopped until she reached home, and created consternation in the family circle by her unlooked-for appearance, clad in such habiliments. Explanation followed, and in due course of time an exchange of wearing apparel took place. The young lady is thoroughly cured, but she considers that she had a narrow escape.

Kitchen Millinery.

Velvet Cream: One-half package of gelatine, one cup of granulated sugar, large cup of sherry, one generous pint of rich, sweet cream. Soak the gelatine in one cup of cold water for an hour. Put the sugar and wine on the soaked gelatine. Cover closely and leave for an hour. Then put the bowl containing them into a basin of hot water, stirring occasionally until the gelatine is dissolved, when strain and set aside to cool. Keep this covered all the time to retain the flavor of the wine. Now whip the cream to a stiff froth, and as the gelatine begins to congeal, beat it, a spoonful at a time, into the whipped cream. Beat thoroughly when all together and turn into a mould wet with cold water, and set upon ice until wanted.

Haricots Verts a la Lyonnaise: String some French beans whole, or, if very large, cut them in two across the middle. Boil them in plenty of water, with salt to taste, and, when done, drain them dry. In the meantime cut one or two onions into thin slices longthwise. Put them into a frying pan with a lump of butter or dripping, and keep stirring until they are a golden brown color, then add the French beans, with pepper and salt to taste, and toss the whole for ten minutes, adding the last drop of stock, and a very little vinegar or lemon juice. This is a most excellent way of cooking old French beans. The length of time required for boiling, of course, quite depends upon their toughness.

Tomato Soup with Rice: Cut half a small onion into rather coarse slices, and fry them in a little hot butter in a saute pan. Add to them then a quart can or ten or eleven large tomatoes cut in pieces, after having skinned them, and also two sprigs of parsley. Pass the tomato through a sieve. Put into the stew-pan butter the size of a pigeon's egg, and when it bubbles sprinkle in a teaspoontul of flour; when it has cooked a minute stir in the tomato pulp; season with pepper and salt. It is an improvement to add a cupful or more of stock; however, if it is not at hand, it may be omitted. Return the soup to the fire, and when quite hot add a cupful of fresh-boiled rice and a teaspoonful of soda.

Snowballs: Two cups of sugar, one-half cup of butter, one cup of sweet milk, three cups of flour, three teaspoonfuls of baking powder, whites of five eggs. Bake in deep square tins. The day following, cut in two-inch squares, taking the outside off, so as to leave it all white; take each piece on a fork and frost upon all sides, and roll in freshly-grated cocoanut. This is a delicious cake.

Clams with Cream: Chop fifty small clams, not too fine, and season them with pepper and salt. Put into a stew-pan butter the size of an egg, and when it bubbles sprinkle in a teaspoonful of flour, which cook a few minutes; stir gradually into it the clam liquor, then the clams, which stew about two or three minutes; then add a cupful of boiling cream, and serve immediately.

Egg Plant: Cut the plant into slices less than half an inch thick, without paring off the skin; then sprinkle pepper and salt between the parts, and cover with a plate; let them remain an hour, then dip each slice separately, first into beaten egg, then in fine bread or cracker crumbs. Saute them to a light brown in hot lard or butter.

Something About Bonnets.

Mrs. Langtry has had many sins laid at her door. The latest charge is rather a novel one, but probably possesses more truth than the majority of such assertions. Said one of our local milliners yesterday: "The Lily has completely demoralized the millinery business of the whole country this fall. Just because she saw fit, on rainy days, to wear a small, close-fitting cap, covered with the material of which her dress was made, almost every lady in the land must needs adopt that style for fall head wear; and the cap has suddenly sprung into such prominence that every milliner votes it a nuisance." This Langtry cap has been worn so much, and has become so common, that ladies who wish to be stylish have been forced to discard it and adopt in its place the more English styles, such as walking and coaching hats. These are generally felts, in wood, brown or gray shades. Silk velvets of the same tints are also very fashionable. This is rather an innovation in this country, and a good one, for the hats are pretty and striking. The most desirable trimmings are fancy feathers and birds. Ostrich tips are worn in connection with these trimmings or alone. Flowers are almost wholly discarded for hats, and so are all varieties of ribbons and cut silks.

The small horseshoe bonnet, which has been in favor for the past few seasons, is no longer la mode. The Mother Hubbard and similar styles are entirely superseding it. For the little misses, astrachan and cloth Tam O'Shanters are in the lead, and bid fair to remain popular through the season. They are much warmer and afford better protection against severe weather than any of the other styles. The designs for hat frames are imported directly from Paris, and are made up and copied in New York and other Eastern cities. It is acknowledged by experts that these copies of French patterns, made up by American manufacturers, are much superior to the originals. Their shape and make up is vastly preferable. St. Paul and Minneapolis wholesale houses are selling many more frames, and less ready made hats this season than ever before. This is partially due to the Langtry craze, for the milliners make up and cover the frames to match the dress of the purchaser. The styles are received here three days after they are exhibited in New York. St. Paul imports the patterns direct from Paris. Hats are rather more expensive this season, on account of the high priced feathers and birds used in trimming. The styles are pretty and rich.

A FIGHT FOR A CHILD.

Attempt of the Agent of the Milwaukee Humane Society to Secure Possession of Bessie Belle Gray, at Rochester.

Rochester, Minn.: Special: A case involving some mystery and causing much excitement has been developed during the past few days. The following facts have been learned up to date: Bessie Bell Gray, now some nine years of age, was born in New Hampshire. Her father died two years ago. Her mother moved to Milwaukee, and, after suffering severe poverty and distress, she applied to the Humane society of Milwaukee for a home for the girl, while she went out as a professional nurse. Through the agency of the society, Bessie was adopted by one Anthony Koenan and wife. He was a Catholic and a court stenographer. After living with the couple a short time, Bessie complained of cruel treatment by Mrs. K.—claiming that she was beaten, starved, locked in dark closet for a day at a time, and misused generally. The mother resolved to relieve the child. Through the help of the sons of Mrs. Thayer, whom she was at that time nursing, the child was sent alone to St. Paul, where the Thayers met her, and shortly after brought her to Rochester on Sept. 1, 1882. As Thayer and Bessie left the cars that afternoon, Orrin B. Brooks, a farmer living north of the city, was passing. Thayer asked him to take care of the child, and the next day called in Mr. Brooks and arranged for her board until a suitable home should be found for her. Mr. Brooks and his wife consented to take the child, and have kept her ever since, and cared for her as one of their own family, becoming very much attached to her. It appears that a man by the name of Richard D. Whitehead is an agent of the Humane society of Milwaukee. Learning that Bessie had been removed to Rochester he went to Mrs. Koenan in Milwaukee and induced her to provide money for him to follow the child. He came to Rochester, but Mrs. Brooks refused to deliver the child to him, as he had received Bessie from Thayer, and knew nothing of Whitehead's authority in the matter. Besides, the girl was opposed to returning to the custody of Mrs. Koenan. Whitehead returned to Milwaukee, armed himself with necessary legal documents and returned to Rochester to take the child. Meanwhile the Milwaukee papers got hold of the story and published various versions of it. The Thayers saw them and telegraphed Mr. Brooks on no account to deliver up the girl. On Monday of this week one of the Thayers came to the city to settle for Bessie's board, take he and depart, intending to thwart Whitehead and keep the child out of the way until the danger was past, and on Tuesday when Whitehead returned to Rochester with apparent authority to take Bessie back to Milwaukee with him, she could not be found. He swore out a writ of habeas corpus before O. O. Baldwin, court commissioner, which was served the same day on Mr. Brooks, who made return that he did not have the child Bessie in his custody or control. Mr. Brooks was placed under oath, and revealed the hiding place of Bessie in the city. About 11 o'clock last night, the family with whom Bessie was stopping, was aroused by some one trying to force an entrance. He was refused admission, and finally left after many threats of what might come. He gave his name as Thayer, but the way he took to gain entrance throws doubt on this fact. Bessie had during the evening been taken from this house before the midnight prowler appeared, and at present date nothing is known of her whereabouts by any one here. Thayer produces a letter from Mr. Koenan, of which the following is a copy:

Milwaukee, Wis., Aug. 25, 1883.—A. B. Thayer has the custody of my adopted daughter, Bessie Belle, and has such charge of her since June, 1882, by my consent and authority; but this consent of mine of his taking charge and control of her is not to be construed as making me liable for her board, clothing and education for any time while she is absent from me and under the control of A. B. Thayer. ANTHONY KOENEN.

The parties are all in this city, except the most interested one, the child Bessie. The case will be heard before Court Commissioner O. O. Baldwin soon, and more facts will probably come to light.

How Anthony Trollope Wrote.

I found it to be expedient to bind myself by certain self-imposed laws. When I have commenced a new book I have always prepared a diary, divided into weeks, and carried in on for the period which I have allowed myself for the completion of the work. In this I have entered, day by day, the number of pages I have written, so that if at any time I have slipped into idleness for a day or two, the record of that idleness has been there, staring me in the face and demanding of me increased labor, so that the deficiency might be supplied. According to the circumstances of the time—whether my other business might be then heavy or light, or whether the book which I was writing was or was not wanted with speed—I have allotted myself so many pages a week. The average number has been about forty. It has been placed as low as twenty, and has risen to 112; and as a page is an ambiguous term, my page has been made to contain 250 words; and as words, if not watched, will have a tendency to straggle, I have had every word counted as I went. In the bargains I have made with publishers I have—not, of course, with their knowledge, but in my own mind—undertaken always to supply them with so many words, and I have never put a book out of hand short of the number by a single word. I may also say that the excess has been very small. I have prided myself on completing my work exactly within the proposed dimensions. But I have prided myself especially in completing it within the proposed time—and I have always done so. There has ever been the record before me, and a week passed with an insufficient number of pages has been a blister to my eye, and a month so disgraced would have been a sorrow to my heart.

Mary Harris Marries Her Lawyer.

Washington Special: In 1865 Miss Mary Harris, a woman about twenty-seven years old and fairly good-looking, came to Washington from Chicago. She made a great sensation soon after her arrival by shooting and killing Adoniram Burroughs, a clerk in the treasury department. The shooting took place in one of the corridors of the department near the secretary's office. Miss Harris claimed that Burroughs had jilted her. She was defended by Senator Dan Voorhees and Joseph H. Bradley, one of the oldest attorneys here. The defense of Miss Harris was insanity. She was acquitted. The fair defendant in her delight kissed Mr. Bradley. This she did with such great fervor that that gallant old gentleman was amply rewarded for his work in the case. Miss Harris was soon after sent to the insane asylum. After spending some time in confinement she was finally discharged as cured. To day her marriage with Bradley was announced, making a great sensation, as Bradley is a wealthy member of the bar, fully eighty years of age. Miss Harris is fully forty-five, but is a well preserved woman.

Mary Churchill Found.

The mystery surrounding the disappearance of Mary Churchill, daughter of the wealthy St. Louis merchant, has been solved by the complete identification of the missing girl in Indianapolis, after a fruitless search of nearly two months, by detectives all over the land. Dr. Fletcher, of the insane hospital, was struck with the description of the missing girl to a remarkable closeness with which it answered the appearance of a domestic in the laundry department, and at once notified the authorities, who, in company with Thomas J. Gallagher, of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, called at the asylum and identified the girl. She gives no reason for her sudden disappearance. She left the city to-night in company with her father to pay a visit to her mother, but declares she can make her own living, and informed Dr. Fletcher that she would report for duty on Wednesday.

TANGLEFOOT.

Balm of the prairies! Ale of good old rye!
Nectar of Yankeedom that fires the eye!
Bourbon far fiercer than your namesake race,
Whose ardent soul is stamped upon the face.
Blest tanglefoot, my rhyme shall give you place!

Your pranks are playful, but your taste is sweet,
And lightens both the load of head and feet;
Adds force to feeling, zest and zeal to love,
Courage to cowardice, by the brave above,
Lions the burro and eagles the wild dove.

From Louisville to Trinidad you boom,
Your blossoms clothe the nose with rosy bloom;
Out on the plains you smile on many a trail,
Tell to the youth there's no such word as fail—
Here's to you, fine old rye, welcome and hail!

ITALIAN LOVE.

Translated for the "Argonaut" from the German of Paul Heyse.

In spite of the dense fog that overhung the snug little harbor of Sorrento, early one midsummer morning, a score of men were busily engaged preparing their boats for trips to the neighboring towns, while as many fishermen were drawing their well-filled nets that had been spread over night. Soon Father Curato, the worthy priest of Sorrento, stepped into one of the boats, and requested to be rowed to Capri as speedily as possible.

"Here comes another passenger," was the boatman's reply, as a young girl, with a large bundle under her arm, hurried along one of the rugged paths leading to the water, and waved a red cotton handkerchief to attract attention.

"Oh! it is Laurella," exclaimed the priest, with a kindly smile.

"Good-day, la Rabbiata," cried a youth from a boat near by, with a mocking laugh.

The girl's eyes flashed angrily, and she drew herself up with proud dignity.

"Are you going with us to Capri, Laurella?" asked the priest.

"If the father does not object," was the humble reply.

"You must ask Antonino; he owns this boat."

"There is all the money I have," said the girl, holding out a small coin.

"Keep it; you need it more than I do," returned Antonino, while he moved a couple of baskets of oranges to make room for her.

"I do not choose to travel for nothing," replied Laurella, haughtily.

"Come, child," interposed the priest, taking her hand and drawing her into the boat, "Tony is a good-hearted lad and will not accept your money. See, he has spread his jacket for you to sit upon; he did not show me so much consideration. But it is always so with young fellows; they take more pains to please one pretty girl than they would for a dozen priests."

Meanwhile Laurella had quietly pushed the jacket aside and seated herself. Antonino muttered something under his breath as he sturdily plied his oars.

"What have you in your bundle?" asked Father Curato.

"Silk and yarn to sell at Capri," was the reply.

"What did that boy mean when he called you la Rabbiata?" asked the priest after a pause. "It is not a nice name for a christian."

The girl colored and answered snappishly:

"They make fun of me because I refuse to dance with them and to talk nonsense, as other girls do. I wish they would leave me alone; I never do them any harm."

"But you ought to be kind and friendly toward every one. It will not do for you to be so cross and haughty as you were toward the Neapolitan artist who asked you to marry him a year ago."

The girl looked down in silence and her eyes flashed. She glanced stealthily toward the boatman, who, with his cap drawn down to conceal his eyes, rowed on, evidently occupied with his own thoughts. The priest caught the glance and was silenced. Presently Antonino dropped his anchor at the Capri dock, and stepped forward to assist the passengers ashore. He took the priest in his arms, and wading through the shallow water, placed him on the dock, then turned toward the girl, but she had tucked up her skirts, and with her bundle in one hand and her wooden shoes in the other had made her way through the surf alone.

"I will stay over night, Tony," said the priest, "so you need not wait for me to return. You, Laurella, will go back before dark, I suppose?"

"If I can," she replied, busying herself with her clothing.

"I shall wait for you till after vespers, but it is all the same to me whether you come or not," said Antonino, in a tone that he sought to make indifferent.

"You must return to your mother by all means, Laurella," added the priest; "it will not do to leave her alone all night."

She stooped, and reverently kissed his hand; then, with a distant nod to Antonino, proceeded on her way.

A few hours later Antonino, who had sold his oranges, and regaled himself at the inn, stood upon the dock making arrangements for his return trip. Soon Laurella approached, but hesitated when she reached the water's edge, and looked about in hopes of having other passengers to accompany her. But she was disappointed, and Antonino put an end to her hesitancy by silently picking her up in his arms, and placing her in the boat. A few strokes of the oars brought them out upon the bay. Laurella turned half away from her companion, and seemed less disposed than ever to say a friendly word. For some moments she remained thus motionless, with her lips tightly compressed, her eyes looking out over the water, and her manner that of studious indifference. Presently she tied her handkerchief over her head to protect it from the burning rays of the sun, and began to eat a roll which she drew from her pocket.

"Here are a couple of oranges to eat with your bread, Laurella," said her companion, holding out the fruit. "I did not save them for you, but they dropped from the baskets, and I found them in the bottom of the boat."

"Eat them yourself. I do not need anything."

"They are refreshing on such a warm day, and you had a long walk at Capri."

"I had water, and do not want the oranges."

"As you please," he returned, dropping the fruit into the basket. After several moments of silence, Antonino spoke:

"You might take those two oranges to your mother."

"We have plenty at home. As soon as they are gone I can buy more," was the ungracious reply.

"Well, take them to her with my compliments."

"She does not know you, neither do I."

Now, this was not strictly true, for they had frequently met at the village festivals, and Laurella had been the recipient of many an attention at Antonino's hands, sometimes accepting them graciously, and then again mercilessly ignoring them and him. It suited her present mood to treat him as though he were her enemy. This wounded him to the quick. He bit his lip, and jerked at the oars angrily, unconscious of the spray that wet him to the skin, while she, with provoking indifference of his presence, leaned over the side of the boat, bathed her face, took down her massive black hair, recoiled it, and replaced her kerchief.

They were alone. Capri lay far behind, and Sorrento was scarcely discernible in the dim distance. There was not a boat in sight. A sudden idea seized Antonino. He turned pale, and dropped his oars with a determined air. Involuntarily Laurella raised her eyes to his face, wondering but fearless.

"I must put an end to this," he exclaimed. "Your coldness has almost killed me. You do not know me, you say. Have you not seen how I have watched for you, longing for one word, one look, never daring to tell you that your image filled my heart? Though you turned away, and refused to speak to me, I loved you to distraction."

"I'll have nothing to say to you," she replied, curtly. "I will never marry at all, and do not desire to make myself the town talk."

"Do you suppose I believe that, because you discarded the artist? Bah! that was a year ago. The time will come when you will be glad to marry any one. You will not always be young."

"What difference can that make to you?"

"What difference to me?" he repeated, starting forward. "Can you ask? Do you suppose that I will ever stand calmly by and permit any other man to lead you to the altar? Sooner would I kill you and myself."

"I do not fear your threats. I shall do as I please."

"You shall not speak so!" he exclaimed, trembling in every limb. "You are in my power, now, and must do as I please."

"Kill me, if you dare!" she returned, starting back and glaring at him.

"One must not do things by halves. The sea is wide and deep enough for us both," he cried, seizing the girl in his arms. In an instant the relaxed his hold, for she had bitten his right hand, and blood streamed from the wound.

"Must I do as you please, indeed?" she asked, mockingly, as with one spring she disappeared beneath the waves.

Antonino stood breathlessly watching her as she rose and swam with all her might in the direction of Sorrento. He seemed to have lost his senses. Presently he regained the oars, and, in spite of his wound, overtook the swimmer.

"For God's sake, come into the boat!" he cried. "I was a fool! an idiot! The devil got possession of me. I did not know what I said or did. Forgive me, Laurella, and save yourself. Come into the boat!"

She seemed not to hear his appeal.

"You will never be able to reach the shore. Think of your mother, Laurella, and save yourself for her sake."

The girl knew that he was right, for her strength was giving out. Without offering a reply, she turned to the boat and dragged herself in. While wringing out her skirts she observed the blood-stains in the boat, and looked with evident concern on the wound she had inflicted. Taking the kerchief from her head, she stepped to Antonino's end of the boat silently bound up his hand, without raising her eyes to his face, then possessed herself of one oar and rowed toward Sorrento.

* * * * * * * *

Antonino had been asleep several hours, when he was aroused by a gentle tapping at the door of his hut. "Who's there?" he asked, as he raised the latch. The door was pushed open, and Laurella stood in the bright moonlight, smiling at Antonino's astonishment. She entered the hut without waiting for an invitation, and placed a covered basket on the table.

"I have been up to the mountains to get some herbs for your wounded hand," she said emptying the basket.

"You have taken too much trouble; I do not deserve it. Why do you come here at such an hour? Somebody might see you."

"I do not care," she replied sharply; "I wanted to see you, and to bind up your hand myself."

"It is not necessary," he replied coldly.

"Let me judge for myself," she said, decidedly, as she began to open the bandage.

"Holy mother!" she exclaimed at sight of the swollen and discolored hand. "It will be a week at least before you can row again."

While she spoke she filled a basin with cold water, bathed the hand, then bound on the herbs with strips of old, soft linen that she had brought. Antonino submitted like a child. At the close of the operation Laurella drew a silver cross from her bosom and placing it upon the table, said:

"I have brought this for you to sell, because it will be a long time before you can work, and it is all my fault, you know. The artist gave me that cross the last time he visited me, but I never wanted it. Mother says it is worth at least two piasters. I will make more money for you by extra spinning after mother goes to bed at night."

"I need nothing," replied Antonino, pushing the cross aside.

"Oh, you must take it; you have a right to it."

"Right? I have no right to anything of yours. Now go and leave me to myself." He put the cross into the basket and opened the door. Laurella did not move, and large tears rolled down her cheeks.

"Good heavens! Are you ill!" asked the young man.

Choking with sobs, Laurella turned suddenly and threw her arms around his neck.

"I cannot bear your coldness," she cried. "Strike me! curse me if you will, but do not send me from you."

Antonino pressed her tenderly to his breast.

"Did you think that my heart's blood all escaped through this little wound? Do you feel it beating in harmony with your words? But if this is only sympathy, Laurella you are free to go."

"No; it is love. With this kiss let me remove all doubt, for Laurella would kiss no man whom she did not mean to marry. And now good-night."

Antonino looked after her as she disappeared along the road, and the stars seemed to twinkle congratulations as he gazed.

"Who would have thought that this girl could change so soon?" Father Curato asked himself; "and I had just prepared a severe lecture for her. Well, heaven's ways are not ours."

The First Engagement.

It is pleasant to turn to one of the brightest chapters of the amenities of home after leaving the tyrants in gloomy solitude and consider that pleasant episode of home life, "the first engagement."

When it is an arrangement that satisfies prudent papa and mamma, this is the most delightful moment of mature life. It makes one young again to see the happiness of two young lovers. "All men love a lover." The introduction of a new son or daughter—that deep feeling of rest that our son or daughter is to have the deep anchorage of marriage—these are delicious reflections. We forget our trials, our cankering cares; we forget that they, too, must fight the same hard battle of life which we have got nearly through, and we see only the blissful side of the picture. If, however, we do not entirely approve, it is a great duty, and one which we owe our children, to hide from them any fancied antipathy to the chosen one whom we may not wholly love. Good given principles and good education, good health and a moderate certainty of a future living, and no parent has a right if his child is sincerely attached, to find fault with his or her choice.

Of course, no mother ever saw any wife quite good enough for her son; no father imagines that the man can be born who is worthy of his daughter. Sometimes, without meaning it, this feeling will show itself; but it had much better be kept out of sight, if possible.

Either a family should take a girl wholly to their hearts, and treat her as their own daughter, or they should decidedly disapprove from the first. No mutilated courtesy, no half handed generosity, no carping criticism is just or honorable. That their son loves her, wishes to make her his wife, should be a very unanswerable argument for her hearty adoption into the family. And with regard to a daughter's husband the same, and even greater respect should be shown. The old reproach against mothers-in-law now rather relegates itself to old comedy; it is not believed that they are always so detestable as the "Campaigner" in Pendennis.

Yet a mother-in-law should let her son-in-law severely alone, nor dare, because she has a very near relationship to him, to interfere in the household authority, or to say disagreeable things about the education of the children.

The young girl who enters a large family as the betrothed of one of the brothers she has a very difficult role to fill. Unless she is frank and sincere, unless she is very engaging, she is apt to be disliked by some of them. Perhaps the brother has been a great favorite, and some loving sister is jealous of her. Some brothers, even, may feel offended at having the affections of his most intimate friend stolen away from him; or the charms which have won the lover man not be apparent to the rest of the family.

PITH OF THE NEWS.

Washington News Notes.

The November report of the department of agriculture shows that the product was close to 1,600,000 000 bushels. The average yield per acre appears to be 23.1 bushels, 1½ bushels lower than the yield of 1882. This gives a result practically identical with that of October, or the average reported in July. The exact figures would be 1,557,600,000 bushels. In the revision of the season's returns this result will not be materially changed. The product will, therefore, be about 40,000,000 bushels short of the previous crop, notwithstanding the increase in area. The potato crop is large, amounting to about 175,000,000 bushels.

It is understood that Secretary Lincoln has prepared a review of the facts in regard to the failure of the Greeley relief expedition, in which he criticises somewhat severely the instructions of Gen. Hazen. Gen. Hazen has also prepared a review of the facts, in which Lieut. Garlington is blamed severely.

Postoffices discontinued: Wisconsin—Northville, Marathon county. Special service discontinued: Dakota—Cortland to Roscoe.

Railroad and River News.

A new office, that of consulting freight agent is to be created by the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway company, and O. E. Britt, a well known wealthy Milwaukee grain commission merchant will be appointed to fill it. Mr. Britt was formerly connected with the St. Paul management, and his familiarity with the freight business combined with his well known business sagacity and his great personal popularity has caused this move by the company.

Wausau, Wis., is to have another rail road. At a mass meeting, held recently it was practically decided to grant the Chicago & Northwestern road the right-of-way through the county and depot grounds. The proposed extension is from Neillsville to Wausau, about seventy-five miles, and through a fine piece of country. The survey will be made this winter.

The annual report of the Chicago & Iowa shows its capital stock to be $1,428,000; bonded debt, $2,150,090; floating debt, $255,641; total liabilities $3,833,246. The length of the road is 104 miles. Its gross earnings for the past year were $535,049; and operating expenses and taxes, $392,701.

The Criminal Record.

In a disturbance at Wakefield, Va., after the pools close, several shots were exchanged, and R. W. White, a prominent democrat, was shot fatally. Cause, political discussion. It is thought that W. H. Morris proprietor of a hotel at Wakefield, has been killed. At the time of the disturbance, Morris, against whom there was some ill feeling, attempted to leave the crowd, when he was pursued by a mob. Nothing has since been learned of his whereabouts, and it is supposed that after being killed the body was concealed.

Mrs. Susannah Nelson of Anderson, Ind. started to Nebraska on Sept. 6, and has not since been heard from. She had a large sum of money with her. Marshal Coburn recently made known to her brothers that he had found a fire insurance policy issued to Mrs Nelson, in the woods near Terre Haute, where some time ago the badly mutilated body of a woman was found by a hunter. He claims to have proof that Mrs. Nelson was murdered.

The trial of Stephen Sprice, charged with embezzling $87,000 as executor and trustee of the estate of Thomas Richardson, began in Philadelphia on the 7th inst. The defense applied for a more special bill of particulars. The judge said he would consider the matter as the case progressed on the prosecution. It is alleged the defendant failed to file an account of the estate for fourteen years.

N. Gould of Stone Prairie was assassinated the other night. He was riding a horse when he was shot twice and found dead. His body was found in the road the next day. He was a quarrelsome man, very unpopular with his neighbors many of whom he had threatened to kill and carried a revolver in his belt for that purpose. The person that shot him is unknown.

Education in the New Northwest.

The report of the commissioner of education for 1881, has just been printed. The following report is made as to the condition of education in Northwestern states: Wisconsin has an increased school population, a slightly increased enrollment and a decreased daily attendance. There was improvement in the quality and length of schools, and in the annual expenditure and the permanent funds for them. Other facts further indicate a steady and healthful advancement. Minnesota is imperfectly reported. A small decrease in enrollment and a heavy gain in school property are indicated by the statistics given. Iowa had 75 per cent. of its school population (594,730) under instruction, and has advanced in all matters except average attendance. Nebraska has advanced in nearly all respects. There were 10,476 more youth of the school age, 3 227 more enrolled in public schools, and 5,348 more in average daily attendance, with an increase of 569 in school districts. There were 517 more having school six months and over, while fewer reported no schools, and the average term for the state was a day longer. More teachers were employed at a slight advance in average pay, and $2,718 more were expended for public school purposes, and the permanent state school fund increased by $1,893,348.

The Wisconsin Capitol Disaster.

Enough facts have already been developed in the coroner's investigation, now in progress, concerning the recent disaster at the Wisconsin state capitol, to show criminal negligence, not to say fraud on the part of somebody. The brick cross walls were known to be badly cracked for days before the accident. Efforts were made to patch up these gaping defects by the use of jack-screws and fresh mortar. So palpable was the danger that some of the workman began to fear to continue their work. There is some evidence also that the brick used was of very poor quality. In fine, there is little room for doubt concerning the shameful condition of the work. The point now is to fix the blame where it belongs.

He Has No Use for His Coffin.

There is a long, black box at the custom-house in New York which the authorities would be very glad to be rid of. It is made of metal covered with black cloth, has heavy silver mounting, and it is altogether quite a handsome casket. There is nothing in it, and it is brand new. What to do with it bothers the officials. The history of it is this: W. G. Warnock, a passenger by the steamer France, was in such a precarious condition of health when he left England, that it was feared he would die on the voyage. So he prepared for it before leaving England. He bought the casket in Liverpool. It cost £24. Fortunately for Mr. Warnock he did not die during the voyage. On the contrary, he reached New York in greatly improved health. The casket was landed with the rest of Mr. Warnock's effects. The question to be decided is whether it was in personal use. Personal property which the owner has had for twelve months or which he has in use, he is entitled to entry free of duty, but a coffin, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, is puzzling the inspectors.

WISCONSIN CAPITOL.

The Second Floor and South Wall of the Capitol Extension at Madison Tumble Down.—Four Men Killed and a Score Wounded—An Architectural Blunder Evidently the Cause.

A frightful accident occurred on Thursday afternoon, at Madison, Wisconsin when nearly the entire second story of the south wall of the south wing of the capitol extension fell with a crash, followed immediately by the entire roof of the structure. The wing was 100 feet long, 80 feet wide and 80 feet high, of solid stone and fire proof. All the external work on it had been completed with the exception of a small portion of lining upon the roof, a gang of men being employed at the time of the accident upon this work. The terrific and awful crash was heard in the remotest portion of the city and fairly made the earth tremble. Thousands of excited people immediately rushed to the scene of the disaster, from which a great cloud of dust arose and groans could be heard issuing from within the broken walls, as men suffering untold agony of body endeavored to call assistance to themselves from without the building. Two men could be seen forty feet from the ground waving their hands wildly for aid, while they hung head downward and unable to move their legs, which were crushed securely between heavy timbers. About fifty men were working upon the wing at the time of the casualty, and after all the dead and injured that could be found had been removed from the debris, contractor Nolan got his men together and called the roll, which showed that all were accounted for, when the search was abandoned. The following is a list of the killed:

Bernard Higgins, laborer, fifty years old, Madison.

William Edgar, mason, Madison; buried under the debris and horribly crushed.

Micheal Zwank, mason, Madison; died after being taken out.

William G. Jones, mason, Milwaukee: skull fractured; died since taken out.

Appearances indicate that the whole cause of the accident is attributable to the second story balcony pillars, which were directly at the center of the south wing, striking in the wooden planks upon which they rested. The sagging drew the upper wall outward, and the whole thing came down with a crash, followed immediately by the crashing in of the entire roof, which was thus relieved of one of its main supports Another theory is that the rain of Tuesday ran from the roof upon the wall which gave away, dampening and weakening it to such an extent that it was unable to bear the heavy strain of the roof, and hence gave way to it. Still another theory is that the roof was not self-supporting and spread to such an extent as to bulge the wall outward. Oscar Nowlan of Janesville, and John Bentley, sheriff of Milwaukee county, are the contractors, while D. E Jones of Madison is the architect. The extension has been in course of construction for nearly two years, and was to have been completed by Jan. 1. The monetary loss is heavy, probably in the neighborhood of $50,000, and, of course devolving upon the contractor.

The Next Republican Committee Meeting.

ATCHISON, Nov. 7.—Col. John A. Martin, secretary of the National Republican committee, sent out to-day the following call:

A meeting of the Republican National committee will be held at the Arlington house, Washington, D. C., Wednesday, Dec. 12, 1883, at 12 o'clock, for the purpose of deciding the date and place for holding the next National Republican convention. The committee will also elect a chairman, vice Gov. Marshall Jewell, deceased. At a meeting of the committee held in Washington on the 17th of January last, the following resolution was adopted:

"Resolved: That the call for the next Republican National convention shall be so broad and liberal as to unite the corporation without imposing any other tests of fealty of all citizens who are in favor of elevating and dignifying American labor, protecting and extending home industries, giving free popular education to the masses of the people, securing free suffrage and honest count of the ballots, and effectually protecting all human rights in every section of our common country, and who are willing to support the nominees of the convention."

The committee also fixed a basis of representation in the next National convention, and manner of electing delegates by the adoption of the following order: The Republican National convention of 1884 shall consist of four delegates at large from each State, and two delegates from each congressional district. The delegates at large shall be chosen by popular delegate State conventions, called on not less than twenty days' published notice and held not more than sixty days before the time fixed for the meeting of the national convention. Republicans of various congressional districts shall have the option of electing their delegates at separate popular delegate conventions called on similar notice and held in districts at any time within fifteen days next prior to the meeting of the State convention, or by subdivisions of State conventions into district conventions; and such delegates shall be chosen in the latter method, if not elected previous to the meeting of the State convention, all district delegates to be accorded by the officers of such district convention. Two delegates shall be allowed from each territory and from the District of Columbia, similarly chosen. Notices of contests shall be given to the national committee, accompanied by full printed statements of grounds of contest, which also shall be made public; and preference in the order of hearing and determining contests shall be given by the convention according to dates of the reception of such notices and statements by the national committee. A full attendance of members is earnestly requested.

(Signed) J. A. MARTIN, Secretary.

Ryan and Slade to Fight.

Another prize fight is announced. This time Ryan and Slade are to be the contestants. The proposed fight grew out of an offer of R. K. Fox of New York to back Ryan in a mill with the Maori. Fox has posted $500 and proposes that the fight shall be for $2,500 a side, at catch weights with bare knuckles, and for the championship of America. The present intention is to have the battle ground within a hundred miles of New Orleans or Omaha. The date will be some time in February or March. Slade will be backed by Sullivan and Al. Smith. Sullivan, in a private letter written to a friend in New York, says that Ryan is nothing but a big blowhard, and that he (Sullivan) is ready to whip him with gloves anywhere at twenty-four hours' notice. Sullivan's opinion is the same as that formed by most of the people who have seen Ryan spar.

A Virginia Election Episode.

Petersburg, Va., Special: Senator Mahone's life was in great danger for a few moments this afternoon. He was driving in a carriage from one precinct to another in company with his son when a squabble was observed on the street between a Funder and colored man who had, it appeared, been paid money to vote the Funder or Democratic ticket. Mahone stopped his carriage, and alighting, stepped in between the combatants, saying that there must be no disturbance. He was instantly surrounded by a dense crowd of whites and blacks, a number of excited roughs trying to reach the senator's person, yelling and cursing in the most violent manner. His son, Butler, fearing for his father's safety, leaped from the carriage and drew his pistol. Instantly a dozen weapons were drawn and bloodshed seemed imminent. A white Democrat reached the senator and struck him in the face with his fist, when a reaction took place immediatley, and there was a general exclamation of "Shame!" All parties put up their weapons by mutual consent. In the meantime many who could extricate themselves from the jam had begun to run, fearing a general fusilade. All the parties appeared heartily ashamed of the violence shown the senator, who was acting in the interest of peace, and felt that the city and State narrowly escaped a lasting disgrace.

THE FALL ELECTIONS.

No Very Striking Changes Anywhere—Gen. Butler Defeated—Minnesota the Same as Usual.

The election throughout the country passed off quietly. There were no very remarkable changes, unless the defeat of Gen. Butler can be so called. Such changes as occurred were due in most instances to local causes, the strength of both great parties being virtually intact.

MINNESOTA.

The whole republican state ticket is elected by handsome majorities. Gov. Hubbard's majority is estimated at 15,000 and the balance of the ticket much more, comparing the total number of votes cast in 116 precincts in 1881, when Hubbard received 9,037 and Johnson 4 820, to this the increased vote of Tuesday, and the inference is that the total vote will be not far short of 150,000 instead of 102,000, as two years ago, provided later returns yield a corresponding increase in the total vote. By the ratio between Hubbard and Bierman in these precincts, which is about that of eleven to nine, the former will receive 82,500 votes, and the latter 67 500, giving Gov. Hubbard in the neighborhood of 15,000 majority.

In the Dodge county senatorial district Severance, republican, is elected over Adams by 450 majority, to take the seat of the late Senator McLaughlin. In the Red Wing district Hall will take Senator Chandler's seat, Bass, the regular republican being defeated by the split growing from last falls contest. In Mower, Wilkinson, republican, is elected to the legislature Gov. Hubbard received 1,500 majority in Ramsey county.

MASSACHUSETTS.

The whole republican ticket was elected as follows: Governor, George D. Robinson; lieutenant governor, Oliver Ames; secretary of state, Henry B. Pierce; treasurer and receiver general, D. A. Gleason; attorney general, Edgar J. Sherman; auditor, Charles R. Ladd.

Butler has been defeated by a decisive majority. In Boston, which last year gave him a majority of 13,370, he now has but 6,211. Only two towns in the State; so far as heard from, report Butler gains. The Republicans claim the election of Robinson by at least 17,000 majority, and also twenty-seven out of forty-seven senators and 160 out of 249 representatives.

Butler, to judge by present indications, has polled about 135,000 votes, or 2,000 more than last year; while Robinson has received 160,000 or 40 000 more than were cast for Bishop in 1882. As shown above, nearly 300,000 votes have been cast, which is an amount more than 40 000 greater than was ever recorded in Massachusetts. The nearest approach to this number was in 1880, when 253,000 votes were cast.

NEW YORK.

In New York there is some doubt as to the result, though the state has probably gone Democratic, excepting that Carr, Republican, candidate for secretary of state, is thought to have been elected. The Republicans claim a fair working majority in both branches of the legislature, which will insure the election of a Republican senator to succeed Lapham. In Brooklyn the contest over the mayor has been a hot one, and the result is very close; both sides claiming a majority of some 2,000 votes, the ticket probably is, secretary of state, Joseph B. Carr; controller, Alfred C. Chapin; treasurer, Robert A. Maxwell; attorney general Dennis O'Brien; state engineer and surveyor, E. Sweet, Jr.

The Albany Argus dem., estimate at 2 o'clock a. m. elects the Democratic State ticket at by 10,000 to 15,000, except Maynard, who is probably defeated by 10,000 to 12,000. It estimated the senate 19 republicans and 13 democrats. The assembly is in doubt.

PENNSYLVANIA.

Complete returns from 64 of the 67 counties in the state give Niles, rep., for auditor general, a majority of 15,443. The three remaining counties, Bradford, Forrest and Sullivan, will increase the republican majority to about 17,000, which is a large republican gain. The offices elect are: treasurer, William Linnesey; state auditor, Jerome B. Niles.

NEW JERSEY.

The Democratic state committee claim the election by over 7,000. They also claim the assembly. The Republican state committee concede the election of Abbott, Dem., by a small majority. The Republicans probably have the senate by three majority, and the Democrats the house by four, giving the latter a majority on joint ballot.

MARYLAND.

Reports from Maryland received in various quarters are very incomplete. They indicate that McLane, Democrat, has been elected governor by about 10,000 majority, and a majority in the legislature.

VIRGINIA.

In Virginia the contest was the most exciting that has taken place for many years owing to the fact that on the result depends the congressional reapportionment of the state and the election of a successor to Senator Mahone. Both sides claim a victory—the democrats asserting that their gains have been heavy in all parts of the state, and that they expect a majority in both legislative houses. The probabilities are that the result is very close, and that it will be several days before anything definite is known.

The Richmond Despatch (dem.) claims a victory with a majority on joint ballot of from ten to 25 and the popular majority between 10,000 and 20,000. Senator Mahone, on the contrary, claims a readjuster's victory.

MISCELLANEOUS.

In Mississippi, as usual, there was a sweeping democratic success. The only disturbance in the state as far as heard from was in Cassiah county, where Wheeler killed Matthews. Matthews went to the polls with a pistol in his hand. He received twenty-four buckshot in the face.

In Connecticut, the election was for twelve members of the state senate for terms of two years, a like number holding over, by five republicans and seven democrats. A full house of representatives, 249 in number, were also elected. Late returns make the legislature stand as follows: Senate, reps., 10; dems., 9. House, reps., 145; dems., 87. One county and twelve towns are lacking, including sixteen representatives. If these towns vote as last year the result in the house will be 155 republicans, 93 democrats. One tie Republican majority, 63; on joint ballot 69.

In Nebraska, the only state officers voted for were chief justice of supreme court and three regents of the state university. The contest between M. B. Reese, the republican candidate for chief justice, and J. W. Savage, the democratic and anti-monopoly candidate, has been carried on quite vigorous by the Reese who is elected, but by a largely reduced majority. The best estimates of his majority range from five to ten thousand, the regular republican majority in Nebraska being over twenty thousand.

In Dakota, the vote on the new constitution for Southern Dakota was very light but it was probably adopted.

In St. Paul the republicans elected R. C. Wiley, register of deeds and Geo. B. Hazard county commissioner. The democrats elected Wm. E. Burton, county treasurer; James J. Egan, county attorney; James A Quinn, coroner; and Geo. Mitch, and P. R Hardenburg, county commissioners.

In Hennepin county the whole republican ticket was elected. Hubbard's majority was over 1,000.

Miss Rundlett, the missing New Haven music teacher, supposed to be murdered, was found insane, a few miles away.

GRANT AND PORTER.

The Ex-General Explains How Gen. Terry Caused Him to Revise His Opinion of Porter's Guilt—He Will Never Cease His Defense of the Claim.

The following letter was made public at New York Wednesday:

NEW YORK, Nov. 3, 1883.—Gen. F. J. Porter, Morristown, N. J.—Dear General: As there is now some discussion as to the probable reasons for my change of mind in regard to your case, now pending before the people of the United States, I deem it proper that I should give them myself. In the first place, I never believed you to be a traitor, as many affected to believe. I thought I knew you too well to believe for one moment that you would accept the pay, rank and command you held for the purpose of betraying the cause you were professing to serve. Then, too, your services had been too conspicuous as a staff officer at the beginning of the war and as a commander of troops later to support such a theory for a moment. But I did believe that Gen. Pope was so odious to some of the officers in the East that a cordial support was not given him by them. I was disposed, too, to accept the verdict of a court-martial composed as the one which tried you was. Some of the members of that court I knew personally, and had great confidence in their judgment and justice. I supposed you had shared in this feeling toward Pope, and while not more guilty than others you were unfortunate in being placed in a position where specifications could be made showing this hostility. After the close of the war, when I was requested to read your new defense, I read it with the feeling above described. At the same time I read the other side as prepared or furnished by Gen. Pope. This gave maps showing the position of the two armies, substantially as shown by the first of the diagrams presented by Mr. Lord of San Francisco, and did not indicate the presence of any other force than Jackson's. Then, too, it appeared that you had actually received an order at about five or half past five in the afternoon of Aug. 29 to attack the enemy's flank, and that, too, at a time when a fierce battle was raging in the front.

I was first shaken in my views, however, when such a man as Gen. Terry, who unites the lawyer with the soldier, and a man of high character and ability, and who had believed as I had, and possibly worse, after many weeks of investigation, should entirely vindicate you, and be sustained, too, by men of the known ability of his colleagues on the board. Until in 1881 I re-examined for myself, my belief was that the 29th of August, 1862, a great battle was fought between Gen. Pope, commanding the Union forces, and Gen. Jackson, commanding the Confederate forces; that you, with a corps of twelve or more thousand men, stood in a position across the right flank of Jackson, and whore you could easily get into his rear; that you received an order to do so about 5 or 5:30 o'clock, which you refused to obey because of clouds of dust in your front, which you contended indicated an enemy in superior force to you; that you allowed Pope to get beaten while you stood idly looking on without raising an arm to help him. With this understanding, and without a doubt as to its correctness, I condemned you.

Now, on a full investigation of the facts, I find that the battle was fought the 30th of August; that your corps, commanded directly by you in person, lost a greater percentage than any other corps engaged; that the half-past four order of the day before did not reach you until nightfall; that your immediate superior had cautioned you early in the day that you were too far out to the front then; that Gen. Pope had cautioned you against bringing on an engagement, except under such circumstances as he described, and that in any event you must be prepared to fall back behind Bull Run that night, where it would be necessary for you to be to receive supplies; that from 11 o'clock of the 29th you were confronted by a force of twice your own number, of whose presence you had positive proof, while Gen. Pope did not know of it. This last fact is shown by the wording of the 4:30 order. It directed you to attack the enemy's right and to get into his rear. Gen. Pope's circular of the morning of the 29th said that Gen. Lee was advancing by way of Thoroughfare Gap, and at the rate at which he was moving he would be up the night of the 30th or the morning of the 31st. In his testimony before the court-martial which tried you, he said under oath that he did not know of the arrival of Lee's command until 6 o'clock of the 29th, an hour and a half after he had dictated the order for your attack. His circular and testimony prove conclusively that Jackson, and Jackson alone, was the enemy he intended you to attack. Your knowledge of this fact, as well as of the fact that you had another force, quite double yours, in addition in your front would have been sufficient justification for your not attacking, even if the order had been received in time. Of course, this would not apply if a battle had been raging between Jackson and Pope. At the hour you received the order all was quiet.

This very short, hastily-written, and incomplete summary shows why and when my mind underwent a change. I have no doubt now but the change would have taken place in 1867 if I had then made an investigation. I regret now that I did not understand your case then as I do now. Your whole life since your trial, as well as your services before, disprove the great burden of the charges then sustained by a court-martial. As long as I have a voice it shall be raised in your support without any reference to the effect upon me or others. Your restoration to the army simply I would regard as a very inadequate and unjust reparation, while men—one at least—have been restored to the army because of their gallantry and wounds after convictin and sentence not only to be dismissed, but to be confined in a penitentiary, and when there is no doubt of their guilt, and given all their pay for the years they were out of the service. I can see no reason for your having less. I hope for you a thorough vindication, not only by congress, but in the minds of your countrymen. Faithfully yours,

A band of 150 horses which had been stolen from different parties in Nevada and Idaho, were recovered last week near Medicine Lodge.

"Mr. Lowell," wrote Matthew Arnold in 1882, "describes his own nation as 'the most common-schooled and the least cultivated in the world.' They strike foreigners in the same way. Smart they are, as all the world knows; but their smartness is unhappily quite compatible with a hard intelligence."

TABULATED RETURNS.

Returns from sixty-eight counties out of the seventy-five in the State, do not materially change the result in the State as heretofore given. The vote is given in most counties, in others only majorities, so that an estimate of the total vote cannot be given. The returns show 50,987 votes for Hubbard and 37,564 for Bierman, giving the former a majority of 13,423.

Hubbard's majority, 13,423.

The St. Paul Turnverein celebrated its twenty-fifth birthday the 5th.

At Princeton, Wis., Mrs. Ellen Long, a widow, and L. S. Whitmore, father of the boy found in the river with his throat cut, have been arrested for the murder: Detectives who took the case had their suspicions turned to Mrs. Long, because of rumors that she once attempted to poison Whitmore's wife and failed. Mrs. Long is a daughter of ex-County Judge A. H. Meyers.

The total personal tax to be collected in St. Cloud for all purposes is $9,361.93, and the real estate tax is $33,499.57, making the total taxation $42,861.50.

The granary of K. H. Halley, in the town of Wangs, Goodhue county, collapsed, burying Ole Shonel, who was severely bruised and nearly suffocated.

Burt J. Sawyer of Villard and Miss Susie M., daughter of M. C. Russell of Lake City, were united in marriage at the residence of the bride's parents by Rev. J. W. Horner.

A young hoodlum named Baker, at St. Cloud, decoyed Jacob Reim into a piece of woods recently, and drew a knife upon him and demanded his money. Reim also drew a knife and told the robber if he got his money he would have to fight for it, whereupon the rascal fled, but was subsequently arrested.

Judge Gould of Moorhead is threatened with an avalanche of suits as a result of the supreme court decision that his municipal court was illegal.

Returns received from various towns in Benton county indicate that the proposition to issue bonds of the county for the erection of a court house has been overwhelmingly defeated.

The Redwood Falls association has been organized. The funds on hand amount to $100. It is thought that $250 can be raised without any trouble.

W. P. Sargent of Albert Lea, who made an assignment last winter, has now effected a settlement with his creditors, so that at an early day he will again be placed in possession of his property.

The Jones creditors at Austin will receive about 20 cents on the dollar.

Henry Mohle, B. S. Mallory, A. W. Frater and others, have filed articles of incorporation of the Brainerd Masonic Temple and Opera House association, with a capitol stock of $14,000; said company to continue twenty years from June 4, 1883.

John Broburg's son eleven years old, killed a bear with an ax one and a half miles from Cambridge last week.

Horse Sense.

The Washington correspondent of the Cleveland Leader gives an incident on the race course at that capital last week which shows extraordinary intelligence on the part of a horse. The steeplechase was being run, and Jim McGowan, Ranger and Abraham, three of the most noted horses, were the contestants. Ranger and Abraham started fairly abreast. Bravely they ran up hill and down over hedges and ditches, with Abraham in the lead and Ranger pressing on his flanks. Within half a mile of the close, Ranger stumbled and his jockey was thrown over his head. The horse stopped a moment, and then, seeing that his competitor was fast beating him, he started on, determined to win the race for himself, without a jockey. He followed the other horse, which was now several lengths in advance, jumping the ditches as he did, and finally gaining on him until, when the two came to the main track on the last quarter of a mile on the home stretch, they were neck and neck. Then Ranger seemed to redouble his speed, and shooting ahead of Abraham he passed the pole several lengths in front of him. It was a wonderful sight, and the crowd cheered the plucky horse as he passed by. Ranger turned his head toward them as they did so with a toss that looked very like pride, but abated not one jot of his speed until he passed the winning pole, when he stopped of his own accord, and suffered his owner to mount him.

Isabelle became queen of Spain on September 29, 1833. She fled from that throne and took refuge in France on Sept. 29, 1868. And her son, King Alfonso, was hooted at by a mob in the streets of Paris on Sept. 29, 1883. There's encouragement for people who believe in omens and fatal days.

The Capture of Jefferson Davis.

Burton N. Harrison, Jefferson Davis's private secretary, who was an eye-witness of the confederate president's capture, describes it in the November Century as follows: "We were taken by surprise, and not one of us exchanged a shot with the enemy. Col. Johnson tells me he was the first prisoner taken. In a moment Col. Pritchard rode directly to me, and pointing across the creek, said, 'What does that mean? Have you any men with you?' Supposing the firing was done by our teamsters, I replied, 'Of course we have—don't you hear the firing?' He seemed to be nettled at the reply, gave the order 'Charge,' and boldly led the way himself across the creek, nearly every man in his command following. Our camp was thus left deserted for a few minutes, except by one mounted soldier near Mrs. Davis's tent (who was afterwards said to have been stationed there by Col. Pritchard in passing) and by the few troopers who stopped to plunder our wagons. I had been sleeping upon the same side of the road with the tent occupied by Mrs. Davis, and was then standing very near it. Looking there, I saw her come out and heard her say something to the soldier mentioned; perceiving she wanted him to move off, I approached, and actually persuaded the fellow to ride away. As the soldier moved into the road, and I walked beside his horse, the president for the first time emerged from the tent, at the side farther from us, and walked away into the woods to eastward, and right angles to the road.

"Presently, looking around and observing somebody had come out of the tent, the soldier turned his horse's head and, reaching the spot he had first occupied, was again approached by Mrs. Davis, who engaged him in conversation. In a minute this trooper was joined by one, or perhaps two, of his comrades, who either had lagged behind the column and were just coming up the road, or had at that moment crossed over from the other (the west) side, where a few of them had fallen to plundering, as I have stated, instead of charging over the creek They remained on horseback, and soon became violent in their language with Mrs. Davis. The order to 'halt' was called out by one of them to the president. It was not obeyed, and was quickly repeated in a loud voice several times. At last one of the men then threatened to fire, and pointed a carbine at the president. Thereupon, Mrs. Davis, overcome with terror, cried out in apprehension, and the president, (who had walked sixty or eighty paces away into the unobstructed woods) turned around and came rapidly back to his wife near the tent. At least one of the soldiers continued his violent language to Mrs. Davis, and the president reproached him for such conduct to her, when one of them, seeing the face of the president as he stood near and was talking, said, 'Mr. Davis, surrender! I recognize you, sir.' Pictures of the president were so common that nearly or quite every man in both armies knew his face.

It was, as yet, scarcely daylight.

The president had on a waterproof cloak. He had used it, when riding, as a protection against the rain during the night and morning preceeding the last halt, and he had probably been sleeping in that cloak at the moment when the camp was attacked.

While all these things were happening, Miss Howell and the children remained within the other tent. The gentlemen of our party had, with the single exception of Capt. Moody, all slept on the west side of the road, and in or near the wagons. They were, so far as I know, paying no attention to what was going on in the tents. I have since talked with Johnston, Wood and Lubbock, and with others, about these matters; and I have not found that there was any one except Mrs. Davis, the single trooper at her tent, and myself that saw all that occurred and heard all that was said at the time. Any one else who gives an account of it has had to rely upon hearsay or his imagination for his story."

Germany's Military Leader.

Count Von Moltke, who has just celebrated his eighty-fourth birthday, is not, as popularly supposed, of Danish origin, but a Mecklenburgher, whose family emigrated to Holstein. He went to Berlin, where he studied at the military academy. He obtained a position on the general staff of the Prussian army (topographic section). Henceforth he had only to bide his time with patience. His merit was known to himself, if the truth must be told, as well as to others. Many instances are related of his frugality of habits. Some time after the capitulation of Paris Moltke went to Colmar, and meaning to stay there a few days, did not disdain to ask for a billeting order. Mme. R., however, upon whom the marshal was to have been quartered, would have nothing to say to him, and Moltke was fain to lodge and feed himself at a hotel—of course, at the lady's expense. He asked for four rooms on the first floor, invited people to breakfast and dinner and treated them to champagne—in short, the Teuton here lived like a fighting cock. But at the end of three days the landlord, who hated him, quietly took leave to remind his excellency that the term of the billeting-order had now expired, Moltke replied with a dry cough and a demand for a small room on the second floor, During the remainder of his stay he dined friendless and champagneless at the table-d'hote. Moltke is as good a letter-writer as Mme. deSevigne, and he sent some particularly charming letters from the East to his sister, who had married an Englishman settled in Holstein, a Mr. Burt. Miss Mary Burt, daughter of Mr. Burt by a former marriage, was especially moved by them; and, when the warrior came home, his thirty-nine winters were not considered a fatal objection to union with a girl of but sixteen summers, was the happiest of matches. She died in 1868, on Christmas eve, and it was a revelation to men to see how Moltke sorrowed. Often now he can be observed at his country seat wending his way, in the gray of evening towards his wife's tomb—a plain marble monument on the summit of a little hill, crowned with cypress. Von Moltke knows something of English literature, thinks highly of Shakespeare, but more highly of Miss Braddon. As to the English army, he is quoted as saying that he considered the old purchase system the only good thing in it. He is scarcely more complementary on the subject of the American service. Somebody once asked him a question about the war between the north and south. "I have never looked into the matter. I don't consider the movements of armed mobs worth studying." Nevertheless, this greatest of living captains has rarely, if ever, been under fire.

Bad Week of Failures.

Bradstreet's Journal furnishes the following: There were 219 failures in the week ending the 9th, twenty-four more than the preceding week, and seventy more than the corresponding week of 1882.

The principal feature of the week has been the failure in the lumber trade in Michigan, and the paper trade in Illinois and Wisconsin.

The number of failures in the western states is the largest, with one exception, for any single week during the past three years.

The POLK COUNTY JOURNAL of last week found fault with an item in the Chronicle, and made a text of the said item to inveigh against the Millers' Association, the elevators, the railroad, and all who wouldn't howl on the same key. We grant the evidence indicates that the farmers are not getting a fair show from the wheat men, but we cannot go to the length that Bro. Cooke does in stating that the farmers are being ruined thereby. On the contrary, the farmers even with the unfair treatment they are said to receive, are prospering when they attend to their business, and don't bite off more than they can masticate. It might make a difference with us if we had wheat to sell, but not being a bonanza farmer, like Bro. Cooke, we don't own a grain of wheat, or an acre of wheat land, and hence are pinched by proxy instead of being squeezed personally. We believe that those who protest against the system practiced by the wheat-buyers are doing the right thing, but we don't believe that every man who don't protest, and growl, and swear, is a villian. There is reason in all things, and a dignified and determined protest has more effect than any amount of howling, and growling and snarling. It isn't wind that is needed in this country, it is work. If those who have wheat to sell would organize, and present their grievances to the R. R. Co. through accredited delegates, they would be much more apt to get justice than by swearing individually, at the elevator men.

The above article from the Chronicle indicates that our good Bro. Dunn is restive under criticism—in fact does not like it. Well, we have at least driven him to an expression of an opinion upon an important public matter, and even though it consists mainly in personal abuse of the editor of the JOURNAL we have accomplished one object, we have found out that that is what he thinks about the monopoly. If Bro Dunn would interest himself in the affairs of his patrons, the farmers enough to post up in the matter we credit him with being enough of a business man to ascertain that the farmers are being ruined by this grasping monopoly. He would know that it costs a farmer under ordinary circumstances $10 an acre to raise and market an acre of wheat. The Millers allow an average price of 65 cents per bushel. The average yield in Polk County will not exceed 15 bushels, so, if farmers were not in debt for machinery, provisions, teams and labor, all necessary to produce that wheat he would only lose twenty-five cents per acre on an average. But the mejority of our farmers are deeply in debt for all these necessaries and are paying ten per cent interest on their machinery and teams. Now take the

which are that many have only ten bushels per acre and by far the largest portion of the wheat raised is (falsely) called "frozen wheat" and gobbled up at from 30 to 50 cents per bushel. Or in plain words the farmer who raises ten bushels per acre, and sells for 30 cents receives three dolllars for what it cost him ten to produce—loses seven dollars. At forty cents he loses six dollars; at fifty cents he loses five dollars. Don't that look as though the farmers were being ruined? Those same farmers have "attended to their business" and have not attempted to "bite off more than they" absolutely needed to enable them to raise their wheat and yet the stubborn fact remains that they are being ruined nevertheless. Bro. Dunn candidly admits that it MIGHT make a difference with him

"IF HE HAD WHEAT TO SELL!"

but as it is only the farmers who are being squeezed it is not of sufficient importance to him to bother his head about—or to care much how many farmers are ruined. Bro. Dunn pretends that our interests in the matter is solely because we have wheat to sell and are "squeezed." We can inform Bro. Dunn that we have the honor to have raised a fine crop of wheat on the JOURNAL farm and that with the exception of a few bushels it is all in the granary on the JOURNAL farm waiting for a fair price. We have disposed of a small portion of it for 85 cents when the millers were only giving 81 cents for No. 1 Hard, but the Minneapolis Millers did not get it. Bro. Dunn admits the justice of what we say, believes the farmers are right, and says that a "dignified and determined" protest should be made YET HE HAS NEVER OPENED HIS HEAD ABOUT IT BEFORE, and the fact remains that the JOURNAL has converted him, so that he now sees clearly what he did not know before, or else knowing it before he did not dare say anything about it for fear of incurring the displeasure of the Millers' Association or the Railroad Company. It touches the "dignity" of our good brother Dunn because we criticised his position in this matter, and yet while he acknowledges the truth and justice of the criticism he cannot come down to common affairs of every day life sufficiently to frankly admit that he could ever err, and while he is obliged to admit the truth of all we have said he gets in what we suppose he calls a "dignified and determined protest" against what we say by calling it "growling and swearing, howling, growling and snarling," which shows how "dignified" our good brother can be when he gets mad. But we can't help it. It is the duty of the JOURNAL to stand by the farmers and business men of Polk County to aid them in their struggle against monopolies of all kinds and we shall continue to do it even if we have to occasionally tread upon the tender corns of that innocent infant (?) the Millers' Association, the railroad company or even our good Bro. Dunn, and we do not expect that any of those institutions will be ruined by our course either, but we do expect that the farmers will get their deserts

AN OPEN WHEAT MARKET

through the combined efforts of the press and people who are being aroused to action. We all know that railroads and wheat-buyers are necessary adjuncts, just as necessary as are the wheat raisers themselves but when any combination arises that threatens the life of one or the other it is high time to take steps to prevent the disaster. It is for the interest of the millers and the railroad company to protect the wheat-raisers as far as possible for when they combine to kill him they are killing the goose that lays their golden egg. The JOURNAL has endeavored to awaken public interest in the matter and when we see the evidences of an awakening that we do see we feel willing to stand all kinds and manner of abuse from all opposers well knowing that the end will justify the means. That hundreds of farmers and business men are in hearty sympathy with us we know, and that every man whose approbation is worth having approves of it is sufficient reward for us

The Lessons of the Year.

That the soil of our glorious Red River Valley is peculiarly adapted to the raising of wheat is demonstrated by the quality of the No. 1 Hard which is annually produced within our borders—wheat that by chemical test has been declared to be worth for flouring purposes at least 25 cents per bushel more than the softer varieties, making a vastly superior quality of flour than the far famed winter wheat of the old country and of Eastern States. Even the millers of old England are forced to admit its superiority to any they can produce at home. These facts are so well-known as to need no discussion, being universally conceded, and our object in this article is to consider, in the light of facts whether it will pay for farmers to continue to raise this No 1 hard wheat for the market. At this time of the year when the store house of Nature is, or is about to be locked in the icy embrace of winter every farmer should examine his books to find out what his profits, if any, have been and to plan for the next campaign. In trade the profit on an article depends in selling it for more than it cost. How long could a merchant live who disregarded this self-evident truth? Let every farmer closely examine his books and ascertain how much wheat per acre he raised, how much it cost him and carefully scrutinize his method of producing that wheat to find out if it paid him to raise it and if he got quite as much per acre as he should have done under a proper method of cultivation. In England, where land costs at the least calculation from ten to twenty times per acre what it does here and where farming, by reason of the fertilizing done costs far more, it is claimed that wheat raising pays. Is it not possible that if farmers more generally adopted the careful English style of cultivation our crops would average far better? In fact has it not been demonstrated beyond a doubt that our most thorough farmers in this valley always raise the most wheat per acre? Let us examine the family expense book and see if there are any little mice in there destroying the profits that should be in the farmer's pocket. How much has been expended for pork, beef, mutton, flour, butter and similar things that should have been produced upon the farm? We imagine that many would be surprised at the sum total. Again how much of the feed for the teams did you purchase? And while we are at it we might as well inquire how much it has cost you to "smile" and be "jovial" with your neighbors when you have chanced to meet in the city. (The rats may be gnawing great holes into some farmers' granaries while the farmers are almost totally unconscious of their presence.) The result of these inquiries should indicate the farmers' campaign for the next crop. Having seen where he has failed to come quite up to the mark in the past he is prepared to avoid that failure in the future. We think that his conclusions (in nine cases out of ten) must be that he has tried to do too much, to cover too much ground at the expense of thorough cultivation. If he decides to adopt the plan of better, more thorough cultivation, to strive to raise twenty bushels next year on the ground that this year only yielded ten; if he resolves to raise everything he needs upon his own farm as far as he can; if he sees wherein he can use stricter economy (without parsimony) than ever and thus hasten the happy day when he can feel absolutely free from debt because he is actually out of debt, then indeed has he learned well the lesson of the year and to him those lessons will be profitable. But some may say that in view of the Millers Monopoly it is no use to try to raise any wheat! Granting that it is a burden grievous to be borne we yet hold that the very existence of such a thieving institution is a still stronger argument why farmers should make a careful study of their profession. We can see in the events of the present year lessons of great value to our farmers if they will but heed them. The existence of this thieving monopoly calls for the exercise of good generalship on the part of the farmers to successfully cope with the ring. Is it not plainly the duty of farmers to organize against this band of forty thieves and fight for the salvation of their homes as many of us once before organized and fought for the salvation of our country? IN UNION THERE IS STRENGTH. Unite in this just cause and you cannot fail to be successful for just so sure as your cause is just you will win. If every thing else fails make it a political issue and fight the hydra-headed monster with the most potent weapon known—THE BALLOT. If, with all else, we have learned the fact that it is also necessary to organize for our own protection we, as farmers, have well learned the lessons of the year and with profit

THE BALL IS ROLLING.

Not only is the press of the Northwest waking up to the importance of combined action in the matter of the Millers vs. the rest of mankind but individuals are beginning to talk it up among themselves and to write it up and from these propitious signs of the time we can see indications of great things to be accomplished. The suggestions of Mr. Geo. J. McManus, in a communication to Friday's Chronicle seem to us to be timely and wise. If a union of farmers should be formed under what name soever it be launched, it could not fail to be productive of greater good to the farmers and all interested in their success than an indiscriminate firing into the bush or a guerilla warfare of bushwhackers. The Great Rebellion would never have been put down if everybody had gone to war on his own hook. Discipline and method was necessary to the end that unity of action might be obtained. Should the farmers unite in a grange or a union of a similar nature their united effort would certainly be productive of greater results than could ever be accomplished acting as they now do with no method or clearly defined plan. We believe that if they should organize some means of self-defence might be adopted in time to be of avail for the next crop. If it was decided best to build elevators (and that plan certainly seems very feasible) the matter could be so easily restricted as to make it impossible for a majority of the stock ever to fall into the hands of the enemy. In view of the magnitude of the evil it seems imperative for farmers to take some action to stem the tide of this great monopoly before it shall have ruined this country irrevocably. Let some action be taken before it is too late. Farmers can now unite and determine upon some line of action as seemeth best unto them. It is a fact that it can do no harm at least and any action is far better than a masterly inactivity. Mr. McManus' article is so full of truth and shows up the hideousness of this great monopoly so vividly that we re-publish it in full. He says:

The crop was barely harvested when the grain buyers began the outcry against smut in wheat. But this did not work in the Red River Valley, for here, of smut there was absolutely not a trace, and the depreciatory cause must have at least a semi-plausible ground. That something was to be wrong with the wheat was decided long before harvest. Genius is all. "The wheat is frosted!" and, in fact, a few acres of wheat were actually frozen. Now what though the grain is hard and plump, and weighs sixty-two pounds to the bushel, "if you look carefully at the kernel you will notice that for all its plumpness and hardness there is a slightly shriveled appearance of the outer surface which infallibly shows frost; and that, you poor ignorant farmers, knocks the price down one-half. "The fact is, flour can not be made out of this wheat, but we philanthropic grain-buyers will take it off your hands just to help you; though really, your wheat is good for nothing but chicken feed." But it is not strange that the millers are finding a way to make good flour from it.

There has not been one-hundredth part of the wheat frozen represented by the buyers, and the St. Paul and Minneapolis papers.

Lately I was on a trip through the country to the south of Red Lake Falls, and at every house I stopped, and to every man I met, my questions were of frozen wheat. One Mr. Beaudron had lost forty bushels by frost and this was the talk of his neighbors for six or seven miles around. Every one had something to say of Beaudron's loss and his negligence in getting his seed in too late. No one else had a bushel frosted. Around Crookston it is the same; among the thousands of acres of grain, there has been an aggregate of perhaps one hundred acres hurt by frost. At Beltrami, an old settler, who avers he knows every farm for a radius of seven or eight miles, tells me that there are but three pieces of frosted wheat in that neighborhood, aggregating forty-seven acres. "Many of the farmers," says my informant, "myself among them, had wet wheat which was almost worthless. This we persuaded ourselves would be for seed. Two of the pieces spoken of were sown with this wet wheat and did not sprout; had to be re-sown, and consequently were so late that the frost caught them. The third was on very wet land, sown late and caught by frost. This last contained 25 acres, and the owner having 80 acres more of very fine wheat, threshed it all together and reduced the grade of his whole crop."

As has already been said, the few bushels of really frosted wheat was sufficient pretext for the buyers. If the crop of the Valley was declared frosted. Well is it known that most of the farmers must sell at any price to pay their debts, and these organized band of theives, through their agents, will give them only 35 and 40 cents a bushel for their splendid crop of No. 1 Hard. For this year we have had a crop of as good wheat as the world can produce, though the yield is not quite up to the average.

Mr. M. R. Brown had his grain cut and stacked before the frost came, and still some of this very wheat is pronounced frosted and will at present bring only 50 cents a bushel. Mr. Brown, fortunately, is among the few who are not obliged to sell. He can wait till "the millers find a way to make good flour from this damaged wheat." Both Mr. A. B. Taylor and a former wheat buyer of Stephen, having seen this rejected wheat of Mr. Brown's, called it No. 1 Hard.

But even those who can hold or who can ship their wheat are cheated and stolen from.

Under the manipulation of the buyers the grain looses its grade, its weight, its identity, and if all this be accidental, it is strange the accident is NEVER in favor of the farmer.

Mr. Herbert Jackson, part owner of the Jackson Farms at Beltrami, last spring bought seed wheat at $1.20 per bushel from an agent of the Miller's Association. This was guaranteed No. 1 Hard, Scotch Fife. In faith he sowed it, harvested it, threshed it, and returned the increase (graded No. 1 Hard at the elevator) to the same Millers Association, when, oh wonderful metamorphosis! it was graded No. 2 Blue Stem. Mr. Geo. C. Reis shipped eleven cars at Beltrami and the returns made them 173 bushels short. Jackson Brothers shipped two cars at the same place and they fell 112 bushels short. This, Mr. Jackson says, was hard, plump, and clean; but besides the 112 bushels shortage, it was docked two pounds per bushels for dirt. Mr. Herriot, of the same place, loses 40 bushels on one car.

On the other hand, another man shipped 1,000 bushels of wheat through the same elevator. His grain fell only 4 bushels short, and he was docked one-half pound per bushel. He accounts for the difference in this way: he was in the elevator during the whole time his wheat was being drawn in. Mr. Jackson and the others were not. He knew where every bushel went and saw every bushel go into the shipping bin. Mr. Jackson did not. And upon comparing notes, is it any wonder, if these two come to the conclusion that this enormous shrinkage occurs at the elevator.

Why all this hue and cry about the shortcomings of a single elevator, and making it the subject of outcry against all?

But it is not a single elevator; every one on this road is liable to have, yes has had and is continuing to have like shortages on their shipments; many in less degree. Few have had the boldness to equal or exceed the discrepancies of the Beltrami elevator.

What redress can the farmer get? How can he protect himself? He cannot get cars from the railroad, for they assert that they have not rolling stock enough to keep cars standing all along the line, while farmers, who may require them, are loading. Elevators are necessary, and for convenience in loading and from a scarcity of cars in the fall, all wheat must go through them. To encourage the building and running of these, the railroad company agree to take no wheat except through them, and this appears reason be enough. Reasonable or not, the farmer may demand cars, threatening, if refused, all the penalties by statute, "in such case made and provided." The company will deny him and defy him and the statutes. He may, if he be rich enough, make a test case of it. But the railroad company can stand any number of suits. It is the old, old question: How is the individual to resist successfully tyrannical monopoly? And the answer: He can't. The same sense of powerlessness led to the successful organized opposition of such unions as the grange. And notwithstanding its maligners, that society has accomplished much of its primary object, and the farmers, by united organized effort can accomplish as much again more, for now can they profit by the mistakes of their predecessors. Let it be a grange, a Farmers' Union or any similar society, building and running its own elevators with an open wheat market.

Our Chicago Letter

CHICAGO, NOV. 10, 1883.

Work before play, is the old rule, but in a letter on all topics undoubtedly the sterner sex will always be willing to have the ladies' installment come first and I will therefore be governed by a new rule, gossip before business.

The social circles in Chicago have been very active during the last ten days and yet the caterers and others who turn an honest penny out of the festivities of the gay tell us to "wait until the snow flies" if we would see a flutter. Weddings in high life have been unusually numerous and for that matter among all classes. A glance over the list of marriage licenses prompts as usual the enquiry "why is it that the foreign element is so largely represented?"

While Chicago has a large foreign population it by no means predominates, and yet the list of candidates for connubial happiness shows a large excess of names which are clearly not American. In scanning the list of the licenses issued one day this week, among one hundred and six names I find only twenty-six that are free from suspicion of having originated in Ireland, Germany, Scandinavian, or some other country in which names are constructed by throwing a handful of letters into a basket and after well shaking drawing them out hap-hazard. True in some instances the nationality is not clearly indicated, as in the case of Bertha Muttontallow—a name actually in the list—though I incline to the opinion she came from England, had it been Polly Beefsuet I should have been certain of it.

POLITICAL.

The elections of last Tuesday have set all the political tongues wagging. On the heels of every election comes an endless amount of moralizing as to the causes which lead to the victories and defeats, opinions as to the "lessons taught" and prophesies as to the future. As the October elections brought out the names of Cleveland, Butler and Hoadly as probably occupants of the White House in 1885 and set the ambitious Democrats by the ears, so those of the present week have developed sage opinions by men who love to be interviewed that the gentlemen named are now out of the question while various names in the Republican ranks are brought forward. As for Chicago, it is greatly to be regretted that one of the results of the election is the retirement from the bench of the Superior Court of Judge Jamieson, a man of great fairness and ability. He belonged to the political party, however, which cast the smallest number of votes, and so must go. Why cannot the election of our judges be free from politics? A pure bench cannot be preserved by making the election of the judges a party question.

BUSINESS.

The hopes of merchants for an active fall trade have not been realized though business has been fairly active. A considerable number of houses are getting into trouble by trying to carry too heavy stocks of goods. The whole difficulty can be traced back to lack of judgement in estimating the probable demands, supplemented by the damage by early frosts and these followed by wet weather which has made it well nigh impossible to get about in some parts of the country. During the last week a number of Chicago houses have gone to the wall, and it is rumored that others are "shinning" the town—to use the latest and most expressive way of intimating that a house is sending to every one who will be likely to accommodate it with a loan for a few days.

The outlook is far from encouraging and yet, while there will undoubtedly be more failures it is probable they will in the main be small, and the next season will open up with a good trade. One hopeful sign is an advance in grain, wheat especially having taken a decided upward turn. This will probably unlock the farmers' bins and put cash into their pockets, to be paid out for clothing, farm implements and other necessaries, and so the wheels of trade will receive a new impetus and all will be happy.

Our packing houses have been active during the last week 112,000 hogs were slaughtered, against 70,000 during the corresponding weeks last year. The summer packing, including the month of October, is stated at 1,801,000 hogs.

I had the pleasure on Monday last of going through the slaughter-house of G. Swift & Co., where beef is dressed for the New York market, and will give you a short report of my observations. The house is killing about 1,100 head of cattle daily. The animals are driven into pens singly and are speared from above. The spear is a solid piece of iron ¾ inch thick and probably seven feet long. One end is sharpened so as to present a blade about an inch in length. The blow is struck immediately back of the horns so as to sever the spinal cord, and the animal falls as if killed by an electric shock. The carcass is handled by steam machinery, and the rapidity with which the animal is transformed into dressed beef is astonishing to the novice, though not more so than the cleanliness with which the work is accomplished. After hanging in the cooling rooms long enough to become chilled the beef is packed carefully in refrigerator cars. It is shipped in quarters and they are hung in the cars much as in a meat market, though more compactly. On the floor of the car are placed the livers on light wooden frames. The cars are cooled by ice compartments at either end. In hot weather these are refilled five times during the journey from Chicago to New York. Only the best quality of beef is shipped and the industry is assuming very large proportions. The house I visited was but one of several extensive ones engaged in the same business. I may add that a visit to the hide cellars was interesting. They extend beneath the entire house. As I stood in one room my companion, who is a dealer in hides, estimated the value of the hides in sight as $40,000.

Meteorology.

Prof. Tice makes a "new departure" in his Farmers' Almanac and Weather Forecasts for 1884, adding much of value and interest to all, and especially to the farmer. The large amount of information in regard to the Care of Stock, their Diseases, Symptoms, Cure, etc., prepared by the most celebrated veterinary surgeon in America, and the rules, now given for the first time, which will enable any person to foretell the approach of frost, are among the new features introduced in the forthcoming issue. "Weather Foretelling," and the article showing how the clouds indicate the approach of storms, will prove of general interest. A "funny corner" will be given for those who enjoy a good laugh, while the careful house-keeper is not forgotten. Send for it, read it, follow its advice, and be happy. Tice & Lillingston, the publishers, 305 N Third st. St. Louis, Mo., will mail sample copy and terms to the trade on receipt of twenty cents.

Fisher's Fancies.

From the Bulletin.

Lew Freeman is through plowing, and so is 'Squire Webster.

Tour. Benson and Taral Gunderson earned $1,162 in 27 days with their threshing machine. The last day's work consisted of 1,100 bushels of oats and 82 of wheat, and they did not commence till 2 p. m.

The farmers have worked hard and faithfully this year, and it seems too bad that the villainous Millers' Association should simply rob them of their hard-earned gains. Oh, that the thief "had souls to d—and parts that could be kicked."

Ole Johnson Brokke determined to clear his farm of the dead prairie grass, and he did it very thoroughly; consuming at the same time 75 tons of splendid hay.

"ESMERALDA."

The Boston Post says: The great Madison Square success, "Esmeralda," written by Mrs. Burnett and W. H. Gillette, was presented at the Park Theatre last evening for the first in Boston. Both as a story and a play it is worthy of high praise. It is simply the story of how a little North Carolina girl, whose parents are, by the discovery of ore on their farm, suddenly made rich, is separated by her ambitious and heartless mother from her uncouth but noble lover and is taken to Paris to be sold to a Marquis for his title, but is saved from that fate by the discovery that the mine which afforded the wealth is not on her parent's farm, but upon that of her lover's. It is a pure, sweet, pathetic, almost poetic story of true love, illuminated at times by flashes of wit and humor, and it not only holds the attention of the beholders but touches their hearts as well, and is indeed one of the most thoroughly delightful dramatic works presented in Boston for many a day. Go to Ericsson's Hall to-morrow evening and enjoy this rich treat.

County News.

St. Hilaire Select.

From the Spectator.

Mr. Knute Steenerson is erecting a large stable in the rear of his grocery store.

Miss Viola Mason of Crookston, is spending a couple of weeks with friends in this city.

The hum of the sawmill is now heard in the land, and Sorsoliel & Darling are turning out lumber at the rate of a mile a minute.

Wheat from the Thief River country is coming into market and is all being graded No. 1 hard. The Sterrit Elevator Co. have shipped three carloads so far this week.

Election day passed off very quietly in these parts and but very little interest was taken in the result. Only about one third of the voters came in to vote. This was certainly an off year.

Notwithstanding our many warnings the farmers still continue to light prairie fires, which are doing considerable damage in this vicinity. Will Sorsoliel had 80 tons of hay burned last night, and L. B. King lost about five tons by the same fire. If the persons starting these fires are found out they should be severely punished.

Red Lake Falls Doings.

From the Messenger.

Mr. Henry Gervais met quite serious loss last week, a mare valued at $200 dying from colic.

W. W. Wilson leaves next Monday for a trip to Brainerd and pine regions.

A. St John, whose farm is north of Red Lake River, had white fife wheat which yielded nearly 28 bushels an acre.

Red Lake Falls, her business men, her professionals, her mechanics her laborers, all in fact who take pride in the growth and prosperity of our town, turned out in force and gave our esteemed townsman, Carl Kretzschmar a a rousing vote.

Mr. Stewart was in last week from his claim in the 13 townships, and reports matters there as exceedingly lively. Without exception, the settlers are making substantial and permanent improvements, and newcomers are rapidly taking up the little land yet left for settlement.

The bridge over the big dam is completed, guard rails up, and the road from the east end to the bluff is complete, and makes a splendid drive.

The massive water wheel for the Roller Mill arrived yesterday. E. H. Draper brought the main portion, weighing, clear of all attachments, about 8,000 pounds in one day from Crookston with two span of horses. It is now at the mill and will be put in at once.

The Literary Revolution.

Alden's Literary Revolution, which has accomplished such wonders in the reduction of the cost of the world's choicest literature, while presenting it in excellent, often elegant, form, has [illegible] is any secret about it, Mr. Alden evidently means that it shall be an open one. A recent publication summarizes with characteristic pith "The Old Way" and "The New Way."

THE OLD WAY:

Charge all the customer will stand and competition permit.

Big discounts to dealers and agents (when competition compels)—let the private buyer take care of himself.

1,000 books, profit, $1 each—$1,000.

Publish the books that will sell.

Take care of "Number One."

THE NEW WAY.

Give the best book possible for the least money possible.

Sell to buyers direct, giving them all possible discounts.

1000,000 books, profit one cent each,—$10,000.

Publish the books that deserve to sell—merit wins in the end.

To make $1 profit and a friend is better than $5 profit.

"Push things."—U. S Grant.

The consequence seems to be that the new way wins the largest retail book trade in the world, which is growing beyond any precedent, and in spite of opposition and difficulties almost without example Mr. Alden has just issued a new price list, with large reductions, which, with descriptive catalogue, is sent free to any applicant. Books are sent by mail or express, "to be paid for after arrival and examination," on reasonable evidence of good faith. Address John B. Alden, Publisher, 18 Vesey St., New York, P. O. Box 1227.

THE REASON WHY.

Fisher Bulletin.

While some hold that the reason of the deflection from the ranks of the Republican party is caused by the turning of the tide against a party that has been in power too long, and others that it was a cry of distress from a people downridden by bossism, others, in all probability, strike the true chord when they give as the reason the fact that the Republican party has fallen short of the high ideal which the people had made for it. If this be the cause, and we believe it to be so, then will the reflex action do good. Undoubtedly much wrong has been committed and perpetrated by the present political rulers, but not more, nay, not so much as, in all probability, would have been effected by any other political sect. The fact that Fisher went Democratic on the Governor's election is fraught with political significance. It was not the Norwegian, more than the American farmers who quietly protested against the injustices done them. The farmers believe that in some way or other the Republican party is answerable for the crimes and villainies of the Millers' Association, and they therefore made the Governor a scape-goat for others' sins. Nor is this to be wondered at, because the members of the Association are all Republicans to a man, or nearly so. Cannot the party learn a lesson from this, or are they so steeped in the sensual intoxication of political success as to blind their eyes to all but that one thing? If not the latter, it will be advisable for them to look to it. The farmers are beginning to feel in its intensity the gross injustice done them, as well as to the hopelessness of mild expostulation. Willing as the yeomen of this country seem to be to stand and be down-trodden by a tyranny previously unheard of, yet they now appear to be looking carefully and thoughtfully, and considering the question, and if the Republican party will not use its influence to put down the gigantic swindle called the Millers' Association, there will be shown them by a united granger element, "The Reason Why."

Farm Notes.

Good Stock.

Farmers are apt to be too careless about raising good stock. They begrudge a small extra expense in food and care, even what they cost. Twenty to 30 per cent, added to ordinary food and care will produce a profit on the whole expenditure. One-third added to the weight of an animal increases the value of its whole weight 50 per cent, on account of quality. Farmers should strive for early maturity of their animals, and this can only be accomplished by intelligent feeding and good care. With the superior quality and quantity of hay and fodder and grain in the West this fall and coming winter, stock of every description should come out next spring in as good condition as they are at this time, to which should be added the growth to the young stock, which is very considerable, and the profits is all on the side of the farmer.

The Value of the Currant.

In an article which appears in this issue, we advocate the planting of apple trees in the spring, but this rule does not apply to the currant, which can, with perfect safety, be set out in either fall or spring. No farm should be without this valuable fruit. In providing a supply and succession for family use, the currant is indispensable, a filling a period of time when no other fruit in this latitude is in season. Strawberries and rasberries are ripe and gone, apples are not ripe, and the currant fills the space. And it is specially valuable for its wholesome acid so needful in the heat of summer and so desirable at all seasons when dried or in the form of jelly. It is the easiest cultivated of all fruit, and on this account it is the most neglected. We do not know of a foot of soil in Minnesota, or for that matter, in the neighboring states and territories, but what it will grow, and with proper care bear an abundance of good fruit. The best [illegible] quite deep and rather moist, but not wet; but sandy soil will do, if made rich and cultivated deep. Bearing bushes on sandy land should have annually a good dressing of old manure worked in about the roots in spring and at the same time to be well pruned, cutting away the old wood which will give room for the leaves and fruit on the young wood or branches to obtain plenty of light and air. We do hope that those who have no currants will improve the first opportunity and purchase a few dozen bushes. We know of no better varieties than the old-fashioned red and white Dutch, though, perhaps, the Versaillaise bears larger fruit. The white grape is also a large variety, but the bushes do not grow so freely. The black currant is a favorite with some, but are not much esteemed in Minnesota.

Wire Fences.

A wire fence is cheap on account of its great durability, the ease and rapidity with which it is built and the money and time that is saved in keeping it in repair. Every man interested in these Northwestern or prairie states is interested in economy in the introduction of a cheap and durable fence. The capital locked up and yet invested in the perishable fences of the West is enormous, the time spent in repair is endless, to say nothing of the losses and vexations continually occuring from their being out of repair. So far there seems to be no prospect of live hedges. Everything in the shape of a live fence with us has failed. The only way we can see is to either use the wire, or let us do away with fencing altogether by restraining cattle from running at large. Perhaps the latter would be the better way.

The Quickest Return.

A friend who has recently purchased a farm in southern Minnesota wants to know what branches of agriculture will make him the quickest returns. As he has about 100 acres seeded down to grass and another 100 under the plow, it seems to us that with sheep and cows he can make the most money at the earliest period. For instance, he will have his wool to sell in the spring, while his butter and cheese can be turned into money each week during the spring, summer and fall. All of his grain, potatoes and turnips—and there should be a good deal raised on 100 acres—he will require for his stock. With proper management, he will find by persuing this course that he has a gold mine that will make quick returns of the capital invested. A good deal of money is made by growing horses, cattle and sheep, but it requires two or three years for their young to grow before they can be sold to good advantage. A colt is never fit for market under three years of age; a bullock should at least be 2 years old and over, while there is little money in disposing of the farm lambs and young sheep.

Proper Culture of Potatoes.

The past two seasons have demonstrated that all varieties of potatoes whether early or late, should be planted very early in the season. We found out years ago that it was well to plant early as possible in our climate on welled-prepared soil whether early or late sorts. Properly managed and attended to, the chances are for more moisture and more coolness, and for against the late frosts of spring put them well down into the soil, where sprouting will go on instead of in the cellar, the tips appearing when the danger from frost is over, and at the time potatoes are usually planted, thus getting a start of weeks and maturing the early crop before the drouth which always visits us in August, comes. By this time the later varieties will be established, occupying with their roots and young tubers the lower, cooler soil considerably in advance of the usual planting and ripening so much the earlier, thus avoiding both drought, frost, which often makes a sad and serious work with belated potatoes. We found that deep planting requires deep working, so as to have the seed in mellow ground. The roots want to penetrate downward as well as laterally. This puts them beyond the reach of even as severe droughts as the ones of the past two seasons. A long experience in farming west of the Mississippi has convinced us that from about the time of the commencement of harvest we are liable, in 8 seasons out of 10, to have dry weather, which seriously affects the maturing of late potatoes, especially this is so in the vicinity of the Falls of St. Anthony.

Salt Beneficial to Crops.

One of our best farmers in our last week's issue wanted to know if salt applied to land was beneficial to wheat. That it is so we have abundance of proof. That it is beneficial to other crops we believe, though personally we have no experience in that way. In regard to wheat, Hon. A. H. Reed of Glencoe made thorough experiments with salt and his conclusions are as follows, which we give in his own language:

The season of 1880, when I sowed at the rate of 200 pounds to the acre on land rather below the average of a 100-acre field, by careful measurement of one acre where salt was sown, and threshing the grain separate, I found the yield 10 bushels per acre more than the average of the field, the average of the field being 24 bushels, while the one acre were salt was sown was 34 bushels, the yield of wheat testing one pound more to the bushel than wheat from any other part of the field. This result was so favorable in 1881, I purchased a car load at a cost of about $6 per ton and spread it at the rate of 200 pounds per acre on 60 acres, only reserving about one acre on which to experiment with different quantities. To make a more practical test I had measured off six pieces of ground, two rods inside and five rods long, without salt. Piece No. 1, where salt was sown last year, was left without salt. Piece No. 2, salt at the rate of 100 pounds per acre was sown; No. 3, 200 pounds; No. 4, 300 pounds; No. 5, 400 pounds, and No. 6 no salt either year. The different pieces were watched with much interest, and no difference could be detected in the looks of the growing wheat at any time. Each piece was carefully weighed, which resulted as follows:

Piece No. 1, salt in 1880, but none in 1881, produced 70 lbs.

Piece No. 2, salt, at the rate of 100 lbs. per acre, produced 74 lbs.

Piece No. 3, salt at the rate of 200 lbs. per acre, produced 69 lbs.

Piece No. 4, salt at the rate of 300 lbs. per acre, produced 72 lbs.

Piece No. 5, salt at the rate of 400 lbs. per acre, produced 65 lbs.

Piece No. 6 no salt either year, produced 48 lbs.

The average yield of five pieces when salt was mixed with the soil either year was 18 bushels and 40 pounds per acre, while the soil that contained no salt produced only at the rate of 12 bushels and 48 pounds per acre. The average yield of the 60 acres was 17 bushels per acre, a much larger yield than was produced on the same kind of soil any where in the vicinity.

Mr. Reed is one of our best and most prominent citizens, thoroughly reliable and honest; his statements and experience should be beneficial to the farmers. Mr. Reed is not alone, however, in this matter. Several other farmers have tried it and the experiments in all cases proved highly satisfactory.

County News.

St. Hilaire Racket.

From the Spectator.

Major Mix, of Crookston, was up getting acquainted with his family, on Saturday and Sunday last. He intends moving them to Crookston to spend the winter.

It is rumored around town to-day that a stock company with a capital of $50.000 has been formed and will proceed at once to improve one of our water-powers and erect a large saw mill to be used in manufacturing the Red Lake Pine into lumber when the Reservation is opened. We breathlessly await developments.

We were pleased to see by reading the election returns in this county, that Carl Kretzschmar had been elected to the office of County Commissioner from this district. Mr. Kretzschmar received the unanimous vote of the people in this part of the district, which shows that they are confident that he will represent the whole district with impartiality and ability.

The new school house looms up in the distance this week in elegant shape. The carpenter work is almost completed, the building has been painted both inside and out and two weeks more will see the furniture all in and the building ready for occupancy. The next thing in order will be for our honorable Board of Education to get together and select a corps of teachers. We have—outside of the new structure just built in Crookston—the finest school house in the county and it will never do to let it stand idle. There is an unlimited quantity of young idea in this district which is running wild for the want of some one to teach it to shoot in the right direction.

A runaway occurred this afternoon which resulted quite seriously. One of our farmers, Mr Ever Peterson, hitched up, for the first time, a team of colts and accompanied by his father-in-law, Mr. Johnson, drove into town to do some shopping. While standing in front of one of our stores, the team became frightened at a passing wagon and in spite of all Mr. Johnson—who was in the wagon—could do to prevent them got away and went up the street at a terrible rate of speed. After running for some distance, they suddenly turned a corner, throwing Mr. Johnson out, and a new stove which had just been purchased, on top of him. The stove was broken in pieces and Mr. Johnson was severly bruised about the head and shoulders, but fortunately no bones were broken. The team after making a sad wreck of the wagon stopped of their own account, without obtaining any serious hurt.

Mr. Jacob Stambaugh having finished his labors on the farm, leaves this week for Youngstown, Ohio.

A little blaze on Sunday morning resulted in calling out the department, who quickly discouraged its progress.

Levi S. Myers, one of the old time Polk County boys, was in the city on Tuesday evening visiting with the boys.

W. A. A. Perkins who has a fine claim near Euclid, dropped in to prove up thereupon on Friday last. We believe at present his headquarters is at Chicago.

Commissioner Knute Nelson arrived on Monday night, all ready for the meeting on Tuesday which meeting he attended on Tuesday, leaving for home on Wednesday morning.

The Sherman house has been closed. Mr. W. H. Jennings has removed to the former residence of Ed. Walsh, corner of Broadway and Fletcher where he has rooms up stairs.

Mr. E. H. Shaw, one of the old settlers at Crookston, is visiting with friends in the city for a short time. He has just returned from Montana where he has been since he left this city.

Governor Hubbard issues his proclamation naming Thursday, Nov. 29th, as a day of Thanksgiving and prayer. The Governor is a little late in the day with this document; however, better late than never.

The Madison Square Company presented "Esmeralda" at Ericsson's Hall on Friday evening to a good house. They are a No. 1 company and if they had had a good stage could have done themselves greater justice. As it was everybody was pleased.

T. H. Perkins, a "horny handed granger" of Euclid, was in on Tuesday to prove up on his claim. T. H. used to be a member of the art preservative and for a long time was editor and proprietor of the Red Wing Republican, but he is now coining shekels out of the soil.

Mr. M. G. Peterson a prominent farmer of Garden called in to subscribe for the JOURNAL and bid us God speed in our efforts to obtain an open market for wheat. He reports that farmers would all be in good shape this fall if they could only get what their wheat is worth.

Frank Stine who for the past year has been working for Dept. Sheriff Hopkins, left for Michigan with his family on Wednesday. Owing to the death of a brother of Mrs. Stine, Frank is obliged to return to take charge of the farm. They will carry with them the best wishes of many friends.

Mr. M. W. Jensen, of Garden, made us happy on Monday by putting up the needful for one more year's subscription. He says that all the farmers in his vicinity are in sympathy with our efforts to obtain relief from the wheat monopoly and they are all ready to unite in the effort to crush the monopoly.

Mr. Ole P. Onstad was in from the town of Onstad, one day last week and reports a serious loss by prairie fire in that town. He lost a quantity of hay and his neighbor, Mr. Lars P. Olstad lost a new stable and about 50 tons of hay. The neighbors turned in and build a new sod stable for Mr. Olstad. Bierman received one vote in the town, not as governor but for Commissioner in the fourth District.

A small lad, son of Mat. Ruedy, thought he would like to see how a nice little bonfire would look, so he procured a few matches and adjourned to the barn as the best place he could think of. The bonfire was a decided success, giving the department pretty sharp work to prevent other buildings being consumed with the barn. Mat had to go without a barn for over Sunday and the small boy probably learned a salutary lesson for life.

An accident happened at Glyndon last week by which a sleeper on the St. P., M. & M. road was wrecked and several cars of a freight on the N. P. Conductor Woolnough's train had pulled in to the depot from the north and as soon as the passengers alighted for supper pulled down to the coal sheds. Meanwhile a freight on the N. P. had pulled up across the Manitoba line and the gate was closed. For some reason or other unknown the engineer on Woolnough's train backed his train through the gate smashing the rear end of the sleeper and knocking a couple of stock cars of the freight about 50 feet toward Crookston. No one hurt. The N. P. Passenger turned on the Y and backed to Fargo. The matter will be investigated to find out who is to blame.

The sale of the Manitoba line to the Chicago, St. Paul & Milwaukee road is rumored.

Juve & Bergland have sold out their mercantile business to Bigham & Olafson who will take possession tomorrow.

Wm Marin has rented the Sherman House and will open out in a few days. Wm. is a host in himself, and with "Joe Morgan" as chief clerk, will be a team.

E. A. Ranson, who went to St. Hilaire to engage in the drug business intends to return to the city again. He did not make an overgrown fortune up there.

There will be a Union Thanksgiving services at the Presbyterian church on Thanksgiving Day. Rev. C. E. Page will preach the Thanksgiving sermon at 11 a. m.

The first drawing at Hack & Gallasch's will occur to-morrow evening at their store. So populat has this method become that over one half of the tickets for the second drawing have been sold.

Patrick Lynch, accused of stealing Jim Kelley's mules was captured by Dennis Kelley, brought to Crookston and brought before Judge Lewis. The evidence being insufficient to convict him he was discharged.

Skating is now the order of the day. The river now affords a splendid opportunity for exercise in that line and a skating rink is being completed to be in readiness when the beautiful snow has spoiled the fun on the river.

The Congregational church will not be opened until Dec. 2d, one week from Sunday next. It will then be formally dedicated. Rev. Dr. Dana of St. Paul will preach and other clergymen will be present. Rev. Mr. Page has returned but will not preach next Sunday.

Relative to the back-door candidacy of "Shep" for coroner, (about which so much demagoguery is afloat) it is but just and proper to mention that Auditor McGuire withheld his certificate of election until he ascertained the exact status of the case, which we consider very prudent in him to do. The legal "Gush" about "disfranchising the people" is too silly to draw a reply from the Auditor.

The Tier remarked that the vote given Henry Shepard for coroner was not canvassed and Henry was abused deeply. The Tier then proceeded to give the Republican party some very good advice for its future government. If the Tier had remembered Davy Crockett's advice to "be sure you're right &c all that agony might have been spared but a nice little story would have been spoiled and an item lost. The board did canvass that vote and Shepard is declared elected, all the same.

On Wednesday morning the employes at the new Walker mill received notice to suspend operations for the present, pending the issue of a question of boomage. We trust the matter may be amicably adjusted to the satisfaction of all concerned. The trouble, it seems lies between Mr. Walker and the Red Lake River Boom and water power Company and we are not prepared at this writing to state what the outcome may be but we trust it will be for the best.

Dr. A. Nelson, of Aldal, gave the JOURNAL a pleasant call on Monday evening. The doctor reports matters flourishing in his neighborhood and that the farmers would all be in clover if they could get justice done them in the matter of wheat grading. He agrees with the JOURNAL that the farmers will all be ruined if we do not get an open market or some other means of relief. He says the farmers all heartily endorse the JOURNAL in its efforts for reform.

A meeting was held in Mr. Walker's office this (Thursday) forenoon and a committee appointed to confer with the Red Lake River Boom and Water Power Company and the Crookston Boom and Water Power Company to see what can be done toward harmonizing their interests. Our reporter met Mr. John N. Ives, who informs the JOURNAL that the Red Lake River Boom and Water Power Company do not intend to and never intended to interfere with Mr. Walker's rights in the matter, that they have offered him free use of the river to run his logs in but that they do object to the Crookston Boom and Water Power Company usurping the rights and franchises of the Red Lake River Boom and Water Power Company. Mr. Ives says that one object of his company is to afford competition in the manufacture of pine lumber to the end that the future lumber supply for this country may be had at less rates than formerly, which appears to be just what the country needs. He expressed confidence that the Walker matter would be satisfactorily arranged at an early day in which hope all concerned will heartily concur.

The Independent will publish during the next few months stories from the following: W. E. Norris, author of "Matrimony," "No New Thing," etc.; F. Marion Crawford, author of "Mr. Isaacs," "Dr. Claudius," etc.; J. S. of Dale, author of "Guerndale"; Edward Everett Hale, author of "Ten Times one is Ten," etc.; Julia Schayer, author of "Tiger Lily," and other stories; and Rebecca Harding Davis, Sarah O. Jewett, Fred. D. Story, Kate Upson Clarke, etc., etc.

THE SUN.

NEW YORK, 1884.

About sixty million copies of THE SUN have gone out of our establishment during the past twelve months.

If you were to paste end to end all the columns of all THE SUNS printed and sold last year you would get a continuous strip of interesting information, common sense, wisdom, sound doctrine and sane wit long enough to reach from Printing House Square to the top of Mount Copernicus in the moon, then back to Printing House square, and then three-quarters of the way back to the moon again.

But the Sun is written for the inhabitants of the earth; this same strip of intelligence would girdle the globe twenty-seven or twenty-eight times.

If every buyer of a copy of The Sun during the past year has spent only one hour over it, and if his wife or his grandfather has spent another hour, this newspaper in 1883 has afforded the human race thirteen thousand years of steady reading, night and day.

It is only by little calculations like these that you can form any idea of the most popular of American newspapers, or of its influence on the opinions and actions of American men and women.

The Sun is, and will continue to be, a newspaper which tells the truth without fear of consequences, which gets at the facts no matter how much the process costs, which presents the news of all the world without waste of words and in the most readable shape, which is working with all its heart for the cause of honest government, and which therefore believes that the Republican party must go, and must go in this coming year of our Lord, 1884.

If you know The Sun, you like it already, and you will read it with accustomed diligence and profit during what is sure to be the most interesting year in its history. If you do not yet know The Sun, it is high time to get into the sunshine.

It occupies two fields. First, as a religious journal it is undenominational and broader than any sect. Its aim is to strengthen and extend Evangelical religion and to defend it against the attacks of Materialism, Atheism and unbelief. It is free to approve or criticise in any of the denominations whatever it believes is designed to advance or hinder the progress of the Gospel of Christ.

Amongst its religious writers are Leonard W. Bacon, D. D., S. C. Bartlett, D. D., Prest John Bascom, Bishop Thos. M. Clark, Rev. Jos. Cook, Bishop A. C. Coxe, Geo R. Crooks, D. D., Howard Crosby, D. ANSWERED PRAYERS.

I prayed for riches and achieved success.
All that I touched turned into gold.
Alas!
My prayers were greater and my peace was less,
When that wish came to pass.

I prayed for glory, and I heard my name
Sung by sweet children and by hoary men.
But ah, the hurts, the hurts that come with fame!
I was not happy then.

I prayed for love, and had my soul's desire;
Through quivering heart and body and through brain
There swept the flame of its devouring fire;
And there the scars remain.

I prayed for a contented mind. At length
Great light upon my darkened spirit burst.
Great peace fell on me, also, and great strength,
Oh! had that prayer been first!

—Ella Wheeler.

Turgueneff's Last Sketch.

I was about ten years of age when what I am about to relate occurred.

It was summer time. In those days I lived with my father on a farm in Southern Russia. Around us, for a distance of many versts, the steppe extended in every direction. No forest, no stream could be found in the neighboring country; only shallow ravines, covered by brushwood and looking like immense green snakes, here and there made their way through the otherwise unbroken surface of the plains. Tiny rivulets flowed at the bottom of these ravines; in places to which well-beaten footpaths generally led you could see, very near the top of the bank, small springs of limpid water, like tears, issue from the ground, and on their edges, in the damp clay, the tracks of numberless birds and other small animals. Men and beasts, alike, need fresh, pure water.

My father was passionately fond of hunting. Every moment he could spare from his work—provided the weather was fine—would see him take down his rifle, strap his pouch about his waist, whistle for his old dog Tresor and start to hunt quail or partridge. Hare he thought little of; fit only, he would say with an air of contempt, to make a hunter run. These and snipe were all the game found in the neighborhood.

But quails and partridges were quite numerous—especially the latter. In following the banks of the ravine, you would encounter at every step little hollows in the dry ground, where they love to squat. Old Tresor would then come to a sudden stop, his tail wagging furiously and his forehead gathered in wrinkles, while my father, pale with excitement, would cautiously raise the hammer of his gun.

At times, to my great joy, I would be permitted to accompany him. I used to tuck the legs of my trousers into the tops of my boots, hang my little flask over my shoulders, and, so equipped, would imagine myself a true sportsman. Though perspiration might cover me from head to foot and gravel and dust enter my shoes, I never felt the least fatigued and never in a single instance allowed myself to drop behind. At each report of the gun and soon as the bird fell, I bounded forward with a joyous shout—I felt so happy! The wounded quail might struggle, flap its wings, sometimes on the ground, at other times in Tresor's mouth, its blood flow—I only became enthusiastic; I never felt the least sentiment of pity!

What wouldn't I give to be able to fire a gun myself to kill quails and patridges with my own hand! but my father had repeatedly explained to me that I was not to have a gun until I reached the age of twelve, and that then I was to have a single-barrel d gun, and that I would be allowed to shoot larks only. Large numbers of these were found near our house; on sunny days you could see them by the dozens in the clear sky mounting higher, ever higher, with chirps resembling the tinkling of silver bells.

I looked upon them as my future spoil and aimed at them with a stick I carried over my shoulder like a gun. It is very easy to get close to them, when they hover with quivering wings perhaps five or six foot above the ground before suddenly plunging into the grass.

Sometimes in the distance, on stubble fields or green prairie, bustards could be seen. "Ah!" I would sigh, "to kill a big bird like that and die!"

I pointed them out to my father with my finger, but he would invariably answer that the bustard was a very shy bird, which would not permit anybody to get near it. Once however, he attempted to steal upon a solitary bustard, thinking that it had been wounded, perhaps, and was lagging behind the rest of the flock. He ordered Tresor to keep behind him, and bade me not to stir. Charging his gun with buckshot he turned to the dog and exclaimed in a low voice: "Back, back." Then cowering as low as possible he advanced cautiously upon the bustard. Tresor would not crouch down, but assumed a gait something like that of a bandy-legged person, wagging his tail and holding one of his lips between his teeth. I couldn't keep still any longer, and followed my father and Tresor, crawling carefully all the way. But the bustard wouldn't allow us to get within three hundred yards; it started on a run first, then, flapping its wings, flew away. Tresor made a bound forward and started at it. I, too, looked at it—with such a disappointed heart! Couldn't it have stayed just a little longer? We should certainly have killed the bird.

One day I started with my father to go hunting. It was on the eve of St. Peter's day. At that season of the year the young patridges are still very small, and my father would not shoot any. He, therefore, entered a patch of oak trees situated on the edge of a rye field, where you were always sure to find a quail. As it was rather difficult to cut the grass in this piece of wood it had been allowed to grow freely, and had attained a great height. Myriads of flowers, vetch, clover, hare-bell, mouse-ear and sweet william, throve there in abundance. Whenever, I came to this spot with my sister or maid-servant, I carried home whole armfuls; but when in company with my father I did not think of picking flowers. I considered that occupation unbecoming a sportsman.

Suddenly Tresor came to a stop. My father made a signal to me to be cautious. Right in front of Tressor a hen quail rose and flew off. But she flew in a strange manner, turning and tumbling over and over again in the air, and then falling to the ground as if she had been wounded. Tresor made for her fast as possible—a thing he never did when the bird flew in its usual manner.

My father could not take her for fear of hitting the dog. Presently Tresor made a sudden dash, and before we knew it, he had seized the quail and brought her to my father. My father took the bird from him and laid it on its back on the palm of his hand. I ran up to him.

"What's the matter?" I cried. "Is she wounded?"

"No," replied my father; "she must, however, have her nest with her little ones close by. She acted as if she were wounded so that the dog might think he could catch her easily."

"Why did she do so?"

"In order to divert the dog's attention from her little ones; after which, if she had succeeded, she would have flown away. But this time she missed her little game, and Tresor has caught her."

"Then she is not hit?" I inquired again.

"No—but she won't live—Tresor must have injured her with his teeth."

"I stepped nearer to have a better look at the quail. She rested motionless on the palm of my father's hand; her head was drooping, and her black eye looked at me sideways. All at once a feeling of pity overcame me. It seemed to me as if the poor little bird regarded me and thought: "Why must I die? Why? Have I not done my duty? I tried to save my little ones, to draw the dog's attention away from them, and here I am a captive! Ah, me! Poor me! This is not just; no, no; it is not just!"

"Papa, perhaps she will not die," I cried trying to caress the little bird's head.

My father answered.

"She'll die. Look! In another moment, and her legs will stiffen, her body will tremble, and her eyes will close."

Indeed, that's what did happen before long. When her eyes had closed I began to cry.

"Well, what's the matter?" my father exclaimed almost laughingly.

"I pity her," I replied. "She did her duty and she has been killed. It is not just!"

"She wanted to play a deceitful game," my father answered, "but Tresor was too smart for her."

"Bad dog!" I thought (at that moment I even thought my father himself was not good). "There was nothing deceitful in her action. It was the love for her young that prompted her to do it. Because she was forced to dissemble in order to save her brood it does not follow that Tresor had to seize her."

My father wanted to put the quail in his gamebag, but I begged him to give her to me. I placed her in my two hands and warmed her with my breath, hoping to bring her back to life again; but she did not stir.

"You waste your time," said my father.

"You can't revive her. Can't you see her head is drooping?"

I tenderly raised her head by the bill, but, as soon as I let go, it would fall back.

"Do you pity her so much? asked my father again.

"Who will feed her young?" I replied.

My father looked at me attentively.

"Don't worry about that," he said, "the male bird, the father will feed them. But listen! There's Tresor pointing again! Perhaps its the nest. It is."

In fact, among the stalks of some tall grass, two feet in front of Tresor's snout, I perceived four little quails nestled close together and with outstretched necks. They breathed so quickly I thought they were trembling all over. They had already little feathers; only their tails were very short.

"Papa! papa!" I cried, "call back the dog; he'll kill them, too."

My father recalled Tresor and prepared to sit down a little way off under a bush to eat some lunch. I remained close by the nest, and refused to eat. I pulled from my pocket a white handkerchief, upon which I placed the quail. "Look, poor orphaned little ones! There's your mother! She has sacrificed herself for you." The young birds seemed to breathe more rapidly when I said it, and their little bodies seemed to tremble still more violently.

I went to where my father sat.

"Will you make me a present of this quail?" I asked.

"If it gives you any pleasure, of course. But what are you going to do with her?"

"I am going to bury her."

"Bury her?"

"Yes, there; right close to the nest. Give me your knife, so I can dig her little grave."

"You expect the young to go and pray on the grave, I suppose?" suggested my father in astonishment.

"No," I replied; "but the thought pleases me. She belongs there close to her nest."

Without adding another word my father looked for his knife and handed it to me. I set to work at once to dig the little hole. I pressed a kiss upon my quail's breast and placed her gently in her grave, and then I filled it with earth. I cut two sticks, and after removing the bark, I made a cross by tying them together with some dry blades of grass; and this I placed upon the grave.

We started soon after to go home. At each step I turned to look back. The cross was white and I could see it far off.

That night I had a dream. It seemed to me I was in heaven, and there, perched upon a tiny little cloud, I saw my quail I had buried in the morning, only she was all white, like the cross on her grave. Around her head a halo of gold spread its lustre; no doubt, I thought, a reward for what she had suffered for the sake of her children.

Five or six days after I returned in company with my father to the grave. The cross had become a little more yellow, but had remained in its place. The nest, however, was empty; not a trace of the little ones was left. My father assured me that the male bird had carried them elsewhere. Indeed, at that very moment, only a few steps from where we stood, the little male flew out of a bush; and my father forbore to fire at him—and I, I said to myself: "No, no; papa is not bad?"

Strange to say, from that day my love for hunting left me completely, and I never even thought of the gun which my father had promised me. Later, it is true, when I had become a man, I took to hunting too, but I never was a true sportsman.

One day I was hunting with a friend of mine. We soon came upon some grouse. The mother bird rose and we fired. She was wounded, but did not fall, and got away with their young. I proposed following them.

"Let us remain here," my friend said. "We'll imitate their cry and the whole flock will return before long."

My companion knew well how to imitate the call of these birds. We seated ourselves among the bushes and my friend began his tactics. At first a young grouse answered, then another, and before long the mother, herself, quite close to us, replied in a subdued and soft voice. I raised my head and saw her approach through the grass with all possible speed. Her breast was covered with blood. The instincts of a mother were prompting her; she evidently wished to divert our attention. At that moment I seemed to myself a monster of crulty. . . . . . I rose and clapped my hands. The mother flew away and the the young at once became silent. My companion was furious; he looked at me like a madman.

"You have spoiled our entire sport," he said.

But from that day on, to kill, to shed blood, became more and more painful to me.—Translated for the New York Tribune.

Oregon farmers complain of a very dry fall. But little plowing has yet been done. Farmers are growling at the fine weather, as they cannot work until rain soaks the ground. Fall sown wheat already looks fair, but would be better for rain.

General Paragraphs.

The London Medical Times discusses beverages from a sanitary standpoint, and concludes that a light bitter beer, brewed from malt and hops, will yet be recognized as the most wholesome drink, and one which will the most surely prevent intemperance.

The largest oyster shell in the world is in the church of St. Sulpice, in Paris. It weighs over 500 pounds, and is used as a baptismal font.

A court in Washington having decided that milkmen's cans shall no longer rattle nor their gongs resound, as has long been the fashion there, sleep may now rest upon the tired eyelids of the congressman who has been out all night on committee duty.

The traffic in church livings still continues in England. "A desirable rectory in Northamptonshire" is offered for sale, its chief attraction being the glebe of about 700 acres, which might produce "an income of £1,200 per annum" to "any clergyman having the capital and inclination" to farm it. An English paper suggests that the advertisement should have opened in this way: "Wanted, an experienced farmer in holy orders, to take charge of a glebe of 800 acres with rectory attached."

A young man wrote to a Chicago paper the other day that he was disposed to marry, but that he thought he could hardly make a home comfortable on $10 a week. Two young ladies have written to the paper that they do not think $10 a week too small an income. Either would cheerfully superintend its disbursement, but one would insist on no tobacco, and the other on no drinking habits.

Mules are now used, instead of horses, in the mines and tunnels of the west. Mr. Adolph Sutro describes those in his famous tunnel as the miners' pets, and are cared for with as much tenderness as children. The animals become so accustomed to darkness that they cannot see on emerging into sunlight, and, to obviate this difficulty, the men in the Sutro tunnel are in the habit of covering the right eye of the mule while in darkness and the left when in the light, so that the animal will always have the full use of at least one optic.

A guest in a tavern being disturbed at night by the incessant patrol of some sleepless individual in the room overhead, knocked at the door of his apartment and the following colloquy ensued; "You seem disturbed my friend. May I inquire what's the matter?" "My dear sir, I am in deep distress. I owe a man five hundred dollars which falls due tomorrow and I have no means of paying it." "Is that all; well, my advice, my good sir, is for you now to retire, and let the other fellow walk a while."

A rather curious case is now before the Lexington, Ky., courts. Some weeks ago a capias was issued to a sheriff, who was a very small man, commanding him to bring the body of a good old minister, who was very large and fleshy, and weighed 250 pounds. He was found working in the woods on a summer day. He did not want to go, and yet he was a punctilious observer of the law. So he went and lay down flat on his back in the shade, and solemnly said: "In compliance with the law I hereby surrender my body to be taken by you," and he lay there till the little man got tired and went away. Now the question is, did he resist an officer?

A gentleman who penetrated into the unsettled regions of Florida recently met there Spotted Tail, the chief of the remnant of the Seminoles who still inhabit that region, and Leaping Panther, the old chief's son. The royal pair were dressed in all the pomp of the traditional Indian, with leggins and moccasins of buckskin adorned with a great profusion of glass beads and strings of wampum. They wore coronets of feathers and had mantles of dressed deer's hide thrown over their shoulders. Spotted Tail wanted to sell some slaves to his visitor. When told that slavery had ceased to exist, and that he had no right to keep any human being in bondage, Spotted Tail replied that he did not know anything about that. He had slaves, and intended to keep them unless he could get a good price for them.

Arctic Monotony.

The Arctic explorers in the Jeannette, during the long winter, found the darkness hard to endure. The enforced close companionship made large demands upon their patience and amiability, and every one was possessed with a strong desire to go "somewheres." When the sun reappeared, after seventy-one days of absence, each man was found to have a bleached look, owing to the want of exercise and to the steady living by lamplight.

During the next summer, the Jeannette remained frozen in the ice-pack. The monotony was terrible. There were the unchanging round of hours, the awakening to the same conditions, the same faces, the same dogs, the same ice that one saw just before losing one's self in sleep. And with these was the conviction that to-morrow would be the same as to-day, if not more disagreeable.

At night, the silence was so perfect that one standing a little distance from the ship felt inclined to believe that no life existed but his own. Capt. De Long records in his journal, "It is positively maddening. The silence was so painful as to induce me to go back to the cabin where my own kind could be seen and their voices heard."

Such facts as these indicate that an Arctic explorer must not only possess courage, but a bountiful supply of hopefulness and nervous vitality.

About the Stomach.

We dare say three-fourths of the diseases that prevail in the human family are directly or indirectly induced by some derangement of the stomach. The most serious ailments have their origin there. With dyspepsia the food passes indigested through the lacteal vessels and many particles of deleterous matter are carried into the blood and gain lodgment often in the lungs and other great centers of vitality. Hence dyspepsia favors the occurrence of consumption in persons at all predisposed to it. It is also the primary source of scrofula and other diseases of the blood and skin.

The person who has a pig-pen appetite one day and can eat little or nothing the next has dyspepsia. The person who feels a heaviness at the stomach after eating, accompanied with a gulping-up of wind and sour particles of food, has dyspepsia. Besides these symptoms are bad taste in mouth, pain in chest, shortness of breath, palpitation, headache, giddiness, coldness of extremities, languor, sleeplessness and despondency.

In prescribing Burdock Blood Bitters as a cure for dyspepsia we desire the patient to eat regularly a reasonable quantity of good, plain food (not too hot or too cold) and to use very sparingly of tobacco (if addicted to that habit,) which is apt to exhaust the organs of salivation. Dyspepsia is a disease of the mucous membrane lining the stomach. If the patient will treat this mucous membrane of the stomach with any sort of decency, ceasing to aggravate its sensitive surface with indigestible matter, we garantee the use of Burdock Blood Bitters will cure him. That's all we ask. Give the stomach a fair chance. Burdock Blood Bitters will do the rest. Thousands of testimonials.

HIS OWN EXECUTOR.

A Well known Gentleman's Philanthrophy and the Commotion Caused by One of His Letters.

Rochester Democrat and Chronicle.

We published in our local columns yesterday morning a significant letter from a gentleman known personally or by reputation to every person in the land. We have received a number of letters protesting against the use of our columns for such "palpable frauds and misrepresentations;" therefore to confirm beyond a doubt the authenticity of the letter, and the genuineness of its sentiments, a reporter of this paper was commissioned to ascertain all the possible facts in the matter. Accordingly he visited Clifton Springs, saw the author of the letter, and with the following result.

Dr. Henry Foster, the gentleman in question, is 63 or 64 years of age and has an extremely cordial manner. He presides as superintendent over the celebrated sanitarium which accommodates over 500 guests and is unquestionably the leading health resort of the country. Several years ago this benevolent man wisely determined to be his own executor; and, therefore turned over this magnificant property worth $300,000, as a free gift to a board of trustees, representing the principal evangelical denominations. Among the trustees are Bishop A. C. Coxe, Protestant Episcopal, Buffalo; Bishop Mathew Simpson, Philadelphia, Methodist Episcopal; President M. B. Anderson of the University of Rochester; Rev. Dr. Clark, Secretary of the A. B. C. F. M., Boston. The benevolent purpose of the institution is the care; 1st.—of evangelical missionaries and their families whose health has been broken in their work. 2nd.—of ministers, of any denomination, in good standing. 3rd.—of members of any church; who otherwise would be unable to secure such care and treatment. The current expenses of the institution are met by the receipt from the hundreds of distinguished and wealthy people who every year crowd its utmost capacity. Here come men and women who were once in perfect health, but neglected the first symptoms of disease. The uncertain pains they felt at first were overlooked until their health became impaired. They little realized the danger before them, nor how alarming even trifling ailments might prove. They constitute all classes, including ministers and bishops, lawyers, judges statesmen, millionaires, journalists, college professors and officials from all parts of the land.

Drawing the morning Democrat and Chronicle from his pocket, the reporter remarked, "Doctor, that letter of yours has created a good deal of talk, and many of our readers have questioned its authenticity."

"To what do you refer?" remarked the doctor.

"Have you not seen the paper?"

"Yes, but I have not had time to read it yet."

The reporter thereupon showed him the letter, which was as follows:

CLIFTON SPRINGS SANITARIUM, Co.
CLIFTON SPRINGS, N. Y., Oct. 11, 1883.

Dear Sir: I am using Warner's Safe Cure, and I regard it as the best remedy for some forms of kidney disease that we have. I am watching with great care some cases I am now treating with it, and I hope for favorable results.

I wish you might come down yourself, as I would like very much to talk with you about your sterling remedy and show you over our institution. Yours truly.

[Signed] HENRY FOSTER, M. D.

"I do not see why anybody should be sceptical concerning that letter," remarked the doctor.

"Isn't it unusual for a physician of your standing and influence to commend a proprietary preparation?"

"I don't know how it may be with others, but in this institution we allow no person to dictate to us what we shall use. Our purpose is to cure the sick, and for that work we use anything we know to be valuable. Because I know Warner's Safe Cure is a very valuable preparation, I commend it. As its power is manifested under my use, so shall I add to the completeness of my commendation."

"Have you ever analyzed it, doctor?"

"We always analyze before we try any preparation of which we do not know the constituents. But analysis you know, only gives the elements; it does not give the all important proportions. The remarkable power of Warner's Safe Cure undoubtedly consists in the proportions according to which its elements are mixed." While there may be a thousand remedies made of the same elements, unless they are put together in proper proportions, they are worthless as kidney and liver preparations.

"I hope some day to meet Mr. Warner personally, and extend fuller congratulations to him on the excellence of his preparations. I have heard much of him as the founder of the Warner Observatory, and as a man of large benevolence. The reputed high character of the man himself gave assurance to me in the first place that he would not put a remedy upon the market that was not trustworthy; and it was a source of a good deal of gratification to me to find out by actual experiment that the remedy itself sustained my impressions."

The conclusion reached by Dr. Foster is precisely the same found by Dr. Dio Lewis, Dr. Robert A. Gunn, Ex-Surgeon-General Gallagher, and others, and proves beyond a doubt the great efficacy of the remedy which has awakened so much attention in the land and rescued so many men, women and children from disease and death.

Talmage Marries His Own Daughter.

Miss Jessie Talmage, eldest daughter of the Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, was married to Mr. G. Warren Smith. The wedding took place in the Tabernacle, Mr. Talmage's church, on Schermerhorn street, near Third avenue. Over 2,000 guests were assembled in the vast edifice to witness the ceremony, and the streets all about the church were blocked with hundreds of people trying to get a glimpse of the bride. The church inside was brilliantly illuminated, and rare plants and flowers decked the platform. Ferns, palms, large India rubber plants mingled their vivid green with clusters of fragrant roses. While awaiting the arrival of the bridal party Mr. Henry Eyre Brown, the organist, discoursed sweet music, and as the bridal party entered, the grand Mendelssohn wedding march pealed gaily forth.

The bridal procession was followed by four ushers, followed by four bridesmaids, then the bride on the arm of the groom, then two little girls and last by the ushers. Mr Talmage performed the ceremony, assisted by his brother, the Rev Gulon Talmage.

At the conclusion of the ceremony a reception to 1,000 guests followed at the house of the bride's father, No. 1 South Oxford st. Here the house bloomed with the rarest flowers. The presents were so numerous that they occupied a room by themselves.

The Cincinnati Gazette says that "Jessie Conthoui, a Chicago girl, is pronounced one of the best readers now before the American public."

General Schenck, says a correspondent, once more looks hale and hearty, thanks to a diet of skimmed milk.

Uninhabited Planets.

"The conclusion of the whole matter, so far as astronomy and physics can now tell" says Professor McFarland in an essay on "Life on the Planets," is this: 'That the four large outer planets have not sufficiently cooled down to allow life on their surface, such as we see on the earth; that Mars give all telescopic and spectroscopic probabilities of conditions compatible with life as we see it; that the earth certainly for millions of years has been covered with multifarous life; of Venus and Mercury we have no certain knowledge; and that the satellites are pretty certainly not fitted to such life as is on the earth; that in particular, our moon has no water and no atmosphere, consequently no climate or vegetable life. If the sun and the planets continually lose heat, then there will come a time in the far future when the sun itself shall go out in everlasting night, and the planets cool down so that the 'eternal snow' would be hot compared with the degree of cold throughout all space, where everything shall be dead."

Mr. Tilden's $40,000 dining-room is at last completed, and it is understood that Mr. Tilden has given orders to bring in the pie.

A Fact Worth Remembering.

CONSUMPTION.

Dr. Meredith, Dentist, of Cincin'ti, was thought to be in the last stages of Consumption, and was induced by his friends to try Allen's Lung Balsam after the formula was shown him. We have his letter that it at once cured his cough and that he was able to resume his practice.

Jeremiah Wright, of Marion County, W. Va., writes us that his wife had Pulmonary Consumption and was pronounced incurable by their physician, when the use of Allen's Lung Balsam entirely cured her. He writes that he and his neighbors think it the best medicine in the world.

Wm. C. Digges, Merchant, of Bowling Green, Va., writes April 4, 1881, that he wants us to know that the Lung Balsam has cured his mother of Consumption, after the physician had given her up as incurable. He says others knowing her case have taken the Balsam and been cured. He thinks all so afflicted should give it a trial.

Wm. A. Graham & Co., Wholesale Druggists Zanesville, Ohio, write us of the cure of Matthias Freeman, a well-known citizen, who had been afflicted with Bronchitis in its worst form for twelve years. The Lung Balsam cured him as it has cured many others of Bronchitis.

"I was taken sick a year ago
With billious fever."

"My doctor pronounced me cured, but I got sick again, with terrible pains in my back and sides, and I got so bad I
Could not move!
I shrunk!
From 228 lbs. to 120! I had been doctoring for my liver, but it did me no good. I did not expect to live more than three months. I began to use Hop Bitters. Directly my appetite returned, my pains left me, my entire system seemed renewed as if by magic, and after using several bottles I am not only as sound as a sovereign but weigh more than I did before. To Hop Bitters I owe my life."

DRY TETTER.

For years I was afflicted with Dry Tetter of the most obstinate type. Was treated by many of the best physicians; took quantities of mercury, potash and arsenic, which, instead of curing the Tetter, crippled me up with mineral poison and rheumatism. The Tetter continued to grow worse, and the itching almost made me crazy. In this condition I was induced to take Swift's Specific, and the result was as astonishing as it was gratifying. In a few months the Tetter was entirely well, the Mercurial Poisoning all out of my system, and I was a well man—and due only to Swift's Specific. All like sufferers should take it.

Three Particular Points.

Point the First.—BROWN'S IRON BITTERS is not an intoxicating compound. It is a tonic medicine, not a drink. It is a skillfully compounded preparation made to restore strength and health; not a beverage to be sold in bar-rooms and taverns.

Point the Second.—BROWN'S IRON BITTERS is free from everything injurious. The most delicate ladies and the most enfeebled infants may use it with perfect safety and with great advantage. While it is powerful in its remedial agency, it is gentle in its operation, restoring wasted strength and imparting robust health in the most efficient manner.

Point the Third.—BROWN'S IRON BITTERS is made by the Brown Chemical Company of Baltimore, a long-established house, whose reputation is well-known to the business world and the general community. There is no risk in buying such a medicine.

An Open Secret.

The fact is well understood that the MEXICAN MUSTANG LINIMENT is by far the best external known for man or beast. The reason why becomes an "open secret" when we explain that "Mustang" penetrates skin, flesh and muscle to the very bone, removing all disease and soreness. No other liniment does this, hence none other is so largely used or does such worlds of good.

AN IDEAL.

BY HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD.

From the Continent.

Age comes to some people only like the wider opening of the rose, the gentle drooping of the creamy outer petal; and one must needs think of this in looking at Mrs. Fernalde. "I have had my three score and ten," she used to say. "I have had all that nature has to give, and now I am living on grace." It was a sunny spirit that informed her, a lightsomeness that never let the substance of a tear penetrate beneath the surface that could endure nothing but happiness. Her unfailing good nature was like a fairy wand that smoothed every trouble out of her way and out of the way of every one about her. If her hair was white, no great sorrow had made it so; and its contrast with the soft brilliancy of a black eye and the velvet flush of a cheek unwritten by many lines, made her perhaps as lovely as one standing in all the full radiance of youth. As for Mr. Fernalde—tall, dark, spare—he was by no means unattractive, and his courtly manners, had a unique elegance. He loved his ease; and annoyances, when they chanced to break through the magic circle his wife drew about him, vexed him, as they usually do a nervous person. For the rest, he was one of those men who, having led a singularly fortunate life, maintain to themselves a fancy that they have just missed the last stroke to make the crystal complete, who have a vanishing ideal always just beyond sight and reach.

The Fernaldes were neighbors of ours. Wealth required no exertion of them, and advancing age secluded them in some measure from general society; their home was always cheerful; they were always in it; and if there had been no such person as crabbed old Mrs. Talliafero, who had spent the last six months with them, it would have been hard to see how heaven itself could be much improvement on it. However, she was going at once, and then where would be the crumple in the rose-leaf?

They loved young people. "The new generation lends us a part of its freshness," they used to say. They always welcomed any of us, and indeed made me so particularly conscious of their flattering favor that I spent a good portion of my time with them, threaded the sweet little lady's needles, read and wrote more or less for Mr. Fernalde and was gradually taken into their confidence in a way I did not desire, since I am about to violate it.

"Could I imagine a happier old age than this, my child, with my wife, my health, my flowers, our birds and pets and friends?" he said once, repeating my question: "Why, yes, my dear, it was much happier before my wife brought Mrs. Talliafero to stay with us. Some old schoolmate or girl friend of hers, I don't quite know whom, for the fact is she nettled me so the first day she came that I wouldn't ask Rosalie a word about her for fear I should show my displeasure at her having brought her home when she turned up. It is astonishing how an invisibly small thorn will destroy your equanimity. And this woman has a quality that would turn honey into vinegar, I do believe. She has changed our quiet, peaceful, sunshiny life, that seemed like one day in June, into a sharp, raw day in November. There is something very rasping about her. I don't see what my wife invited her to spend the season with us for. I wonder that if she thought that at the end of the time I should press for a continuation? My dear, I have counted the days—it sounds sadly against all hospitable rites—I have counted the days till I should see her consult a railroad timetable, as she did yesterday about going home to-day. I believe she is not in affluent circumstances now. I would be glad to meet the expense of boarding her at Buckingham Palace if that would keep her away! I am speaking strongly. Yes, Rosalie," looking at his laughing wife, "I know you say too strongly. But it is argument, assertion, contradiction, differing, bickering, finding fault with the servants who have suited us half a life-time, questioning the expenditure, disordering the arrangements from one day to the next. Think of it, when she comes into my study and declares that my wife has the patience of the play to endure such a den of disorder in her house. She wonders that I do not wear a scratch. She warns me of indigestions, she threatens me with nightmares, she reminds me of my age, she interferes with my pipe! And then she wants so much fresh air! Thank heaven! her time is up to-day, and my wife will not invite another guest for a half year without giving me time to arrange a residence elsewhere! And such a voice, too! When one hears it, one longs for the proper infirmities of age that dull the hearing, sharp as a file, piercing as a locust's whirr! What are you laughing at, Rosalie?"

"Ah, you are not quite just, my love," said the sweet little old lady. "Mrs. Talliafero has a fine mind. She is really waking us up. She prevents our sinking down into a jelly-like existence, as so many of our age do. She keeps us bubbling."

"There, there, there, my dear! Don't say another word about your Mrs. Talliafero! Go and spend a season with her at Saratoga, if you ever want to see her any more. I'll go to Richfield. Bubble! She'd make sulphuric acid bubble out of the sands of the desert! I've no doubt she worried Talliafero, poor man, into the grave! But there, I've said too much," he added directly. "I beg your pardon, my sweet, if I hurt your feelings about an old friend, but really—Now, Rosalie, my love, if you don't care to go over these accounts, our young friend will." And then Mrs. Fernalde tripped off with as light a foot as a girl of seventeen, and I drew up the great folding-screen around our chairs, stirred the fire a little, and took pencil and paper to add up the figures Mr. Fernalde was to read out to me.

But Mr. Fernalde was in a brown study for a little, and I let him stay.

"It was strange you should have asked me that question, child," he said at length. "I used, at your time of life, to imagine a very different old age from this, if I may so call that imagination for, in fact, old age never entered into my calculations. I imagined nothing about the passage of time, only of the continuance of a condition. And that condition was the perpetual paradise of Alicia's smiles."

"Rosalie, you mean," said I.

"I beg your pardon," said Mr. Fernalde shortly. "I mean Alicia."

"Alicia?"

"Alicia, who, when I was twenty, was the light of my eyes and the loadstar of my life."

"I don't know what you mean, sir."

"Of course you don't, of course you don't. I've half the mind to tell you, though. It's a long time ago—a long time—and no harm done. One is perhaps a fool at seventy," said Mr. Fernalde presently again. "I'm not quite eighty. One is certainly a fool at twenty. I was, at any rate; but I didn't know it, and I walked in a fool's paradise. And to be a fool and not know it! Is there, on the whole, any farther paradise? Pretty, pretty as a peach!" he began again, after another pause. "Ah! that sounds to me now like profanity. That heavenly fair face! those eyes like the stars in a blue midnight that smile of exquisite innocence and purity! I used to tremble before her sometimes as before some young saint stepped from a shrine—one that I dared to desecrate by loving. Ah, how I loved her! The sight of certain flowers brings her back to me now! when the apples are in blossom, that pink and white snow, that ineffable delicacy of perfume, calls her before me like a revelation! there are times when this eternal smoothness of things in my life palls on me—times when I cannot bear the sound of evening bells coming across water. It so renews for me that evening—that evening when I lost her—when I lost her. If I found Rosalie!"

"You lost her, then?" I said to break the silence that followed.

"I will tell you. The two are inseparable. If I walked or rowed or sailed with one the other was not far away. Rosalie was a little gay, tormenting sprite; Alicia a pensive saint. It was Alicia's home; her father was a man of wealth, and Rosalie was visiting her. Rosalie had no home, no fortune; she had just finished school and was to be a governess, dreading it as a butterfly might dread being broken to harness, dreading it all the more for this glimpse of luxurious life in her friend's home since school. I myself had a fortune in my own right, and had been guilty of the follies of most of the jeunesse doree of that period, which, if comparatively innocent, were troublesome enough to the authorities of my college to need discipline, and I was passing a year of most unhappy rustication in the place adjoining Alicia's home. Never shall I forget the first moment in which I saw Alicia running down one of the orchard aisles with her white garments fluttering about her, and her fair head bent over the branch of appple blossoms in her hand. If lightning had fallen, the revolution that seized me could not have come more quickly. I seemed to be changed in a twinkling, to have been born into another planet, I felt as if sunshine had pierced and penetrated once impenetrable gloom. When I fell asleep in the grass of that orchard, and woke with that heavenly creature bending over me, I rose only to walk on air. The little brown face of Rosalie, with its carnations, with its glint and glance of its great brown eyes, with its flood of brown curls that had a touch of gold on them, with the glittering teeth of its beautiful laugh, was just over her shoulder, but I merely know I saw it by remembering it afterward. She was only a shadow to me those days; and as for me, I was only Alicia's shadow myself. She lived and moved in some exalted atmosphere, to my perception. She does now. Her father wore the front of Jove; I could not say that he did not carry the thunders. I felt myself a mote in the broad beam of their sunshine, as though I were something hardly visible in their large range of vision, as if it required an effort to make myself perceived by them. I hesitated to make an effort—I worshipped from afar. When she spoke to me my heart beat so I had hardly voice to answer. When she touched my hand it thrilled me through and through. And I asked no more, I thought of no more for awhile than just to continue so forever; to see her from my window walking under the long aisles of the low-branched orchard, like some mediæval picture; to walk beside her sometimes; now and then to venture reading from the same page with her; now and then to be her partner in the dance. Then Rosalie should be about with me, riding here, strolling there, walking to church, reading with the old pastor, in whose charge there was a fiction that I was, and so, in a way, studying with me—that was all a matter of commonplace; she was sweet, she was fresh, she was charming. But what was all that when an angel was in the room?

"One night I was on the gallery just outside their drawing-room, looking in at the long window, and Alicia was singing. Ah, how delicious was that voice! The cherubim and seraphim who continually do sing, if I ever hear them, will not sing so sweetly. I wonder to whom that voice is singing now! Beside her, that night, was this scamp who had come to the place more than once, as proud, commanding fellow in his undress uniform, a man whom her father plainly intended she should marry. I can see the scene now—the rich and dimly lighted room full of purple shadows, the air laden with the scent of flowers; Alicia in her white drapery, more mystical, more beautiful more holy, as she sang, than if revealed in the glow of her beauty; outside the violet depts of the sky, and the moon just falling, like some great golden flower, low in the west, and as Alicia's voice became silent, a choir of bell-tones coming far and fine and free across the water, like echoes of her song in heaven. My heart swelled with a fullness of rapture; life seemed too rich, too sweet, too sacred; and then I saw that man stoop and kiss her brow. The action turned me to stone for a moment, till he came sauntering to the window, and I knew no more what I was doing than that bronze Perseus in the corner would if he moved. I lifted the hand that had seemed stone, and as he passed me I struck him on the mouth, the mouth that had done the profanation."

And Mr. Ferndale was quiet a little while.

"And that was the end of all things," he resumed. "The fellow laughed at me for a mad boy. Her father launched one of the thunderbolts, and forbade me the house. What a stricken day and night of wretchedness! what a week of hopelessness, of annihilation! But perhaps Alicia felt otherwise. Why should I not discover? Why should I suppose she had any other sympathy with that creature than the sympathy of the star and the worm? And if my glad peradventure were true why then we could fly from these places that should know us no more; the world was before us, heaven's gates were open to us. And I wrote, my hand trembling at its sacrilegious daring, just a dozen lines, without address, without signature. She would know what it meant. And it was sent by the parson's boy. And I waited for her lying on the grass beneath the orchard trees, in the deep gloom just gilded by, the influence of the unseen moon. There came the rustling of garments, the tripping of a foot; my heart beat, my eyes grew dim. Was it she coming up behind me, as I lay lifted on my elbow, kneeling and putting her arms about me, raining swift kisses on my face?—wild, sweet kisses in that shadow; wild, passionate whispers in that silence! And then a great pang smote me, and I rose up and went out with her into the less dim darkness—and it was Rosalie.

"She never knew," said Mr. Fernalde "she does not know to-day that I died, that night. I can't say how I lived through these moments even. They were but moments she had stolen away. She had to return at once. We parted at the foot of the mock-orange walk, and I went to my bed and lay there in a trance of despair. Perhaps sunlight brought some relief. The parson told at the breakfast table the news that Alicia was betrothed to the army officer I had seen over the hedge. I wrote a word, saying I was called away, and I was gone a week or more. But in that blank I must have something to love me—to have an interest in. Better Rosalie than the absolute negation of those days. She thought nothing of my absence after my return. She was as full of romance as a flower of nectar. And, to sum it up, if she was not the rose, she had lived with the rose. One day we married, and here we are. A long life, a happy life, and I have never regretted the day in it that I made her my wife. After all, one cannot marry among the angels—clay must mate with clay. What do you say? Not love her, my child? You never were more mistaken. I love her tenderly, absorbingly, she is a perfect woman—she has been a perfect wife. She has made me calmly and completely happy. If once in a while the old hope, the old dream of a passion arises and sweeps before me in its bloom and light, it is because it means youth to me—that youth which we do not know till we are old—is itself the ideal that it holds up for worship. Yet as perfect as my wife is, fifty years of this smooth life with her wear something of the common place, and if across their dead level of same content sometimes gleams the shinning of Alicia's face, it is not in any disloyalty to her. I often wonder what became of the lovely creature. Once I could not have spoken to her. At seldom times, when I sit alone at the fire, she comes and sits beside me, and gleams of light and shadow make a face with her sweetness, her beauty, her pensive and etherial grace. Dear girl! I suppose she sleeps in her grave by this, but she is a shaft of the light of heaven in my memory!"

And Mr. Fernalde rose, walking to the window, just as the screen began to tremble, and a smothered cough, and then an undisguised one, betrayed to me, if not to him, that Mrs. Fernadle had heard the chief part of the monologue.

"And I heard it in fragments and sections more than once before," she afterward told me, with her pleasant smile. 'I know it means nothing—that he is jus as wholly mine as I am his—that our love is the imperishable sort—that we are wedded into one by fifty years together. And perhaps it was ignoble of me to break the pretty bubble, to take away his little ideal, with which he has found comfort whenever I would have my own way too much. Yet I thought it was about time."

But she said nothing of this at all as she came hasting round the corner of the screen that morning.

"There is such a gale blowing outside," she said, "that the dust really rises in the house fit to choke one."

"You haven't caught cold, Rosalie?" said her husband, turning in concern.

"Not the least, but I shall if the hall-door is open another moment. There she comes now. Make haste, and bid Alicia good-bye, my love. She is just going."

"Who?" he cried, suddenly opening his eyes like lamps in their deep settings.

"Alicia—Mrs. Talliafero—dear. She married again, you know. Oh, it has been a fine jest," she cried with her loud laugh, "to think that you should not have recognized Alicia in all these weeks and months!"

Mr. Fernalde was silent for a few moments, looking at the sweet little lady before him, with her color like the half tarnished rose, with the soft brilliancy of her placid smile. Then he crossed over the hearth before me, and he took her hands and bent down and kissed her mouth.

"My Rosalie," said he "will you not make my adieux to Mrs. Talliafero yourself! Tell her—tell her that I have gone to the funeral of an old friend!"

Innovations in Church Music.

In an article on modern innovations in church music, a correspondent of the Newark, (N. J.) Advertiser writes: It is a fact not to be ignored that the music of the sanctuary, in some cases is identical with that of the opera house. One need only shut his eyes during singing of opening pieces in some churches, so far as the vocalization is concerned, to imagine himself in the concert hall rather than in the house of God. If brass instruments, sackbuts, cymbals, timbrels, dulcimers, and all the orchestral accompaniments of King David's and our own times combined, tend to increase worship and reverence toward God, then let them pray their loudest! if, however, they simply satisfy the æsthetic or purely musical taste, then there exists in some churches an unwarranted intrusion of secularities into religious ceremonials. But what if the cultured musical taste demands lofty strains to aid its devotions? Then there may be appropriated the soul-inspiring and sacred compositions of Rossini, Haydn, Handel and others, whose music was written to accompany the most sacred and holy ideas and conceptions which the Roman and Established churches use in their solemn ceremonials, and which, we are pleased to say, are sometimes heard in other churches."

Talmage Marries His Own Daughter.

Miss Jessie Talmage, eldest daughter of the Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, was married to Mr. G. Warren Smith. The wedding took place in the Tabernacle, Mr. Talmage's church, on Schermerhorn street, near Third avenue. Over 2,0.0 guests were assembled in the vast edifice to witness the ceremony, and the streets all about the church were blocked with hundreds of people trying to get a glimpse of the bride. The church inside was brilliantly illuminated, and rare plants and flowers decked the platform. Ferns, palms, large India rubber plants mingled their vivid green with clusters of fragrant roses. While awaiting the arrival of the bridal party Mr. Henry Eyre Brown, the organist, discoursed sweet music and as the bridal party entered, the grand Mendelssohn wedding march pealed gaily forth.

The bridal procession was followed by four ushers, followed by four bridesmaids, then the bride on the arm of the groom, then two little girls and last by the ushers. Mr Talmage performed the ceremony, assisted by his brother, the Rev. Guion Talmage.

At the conclusion of the ceremony a reception to 1,000 guests followed at the house of the bride's father, No. 1 South Oxford st. Here the house bloomed with the rarest flowers. The presents were so numerous that they occupied a room by themselves.

British Way of Getting Recruits.

Colonel Thomas French, a resident of Atkinson, Me., claims to have been of the gallant 600 in the charge at Balaklava. though the good colonel is now proud of having served in her Britannic Majesty's army, he was not anxious to join it during the war, and gives the following interesting account of how he enlisted: "While I lived in Burleigh I fell in with two recruiting officers, who were hunting just such a fellow as I. You've heard of the taking of the queen's shilling. When a fellow accepts this coin from a recruiting officer it's a token of his enlistment, and he cannot back out. The fellow that finally hooked me had been teasing me to enlist for a long time. I went into an ale-house to drink with him. Unobserved, he slipped a shilling into my mug of ale. When I drank I heard it rattle and threw it out. "My man, you've taken the queen's shilling." I knew there was no use to dodge. I enlisted."

Dr. Isaac Bartlett, of Hope, Me., who is 73 years of age and still in good health and active practice, has lived for years on bread and milk alone, and says it is the best food for every one.

FARM AND HOUSE.

Farm Miscellany.

A farmer friend has sixty colonies of bees, a fine flock of Brahma fowls and a farm of 120 acres. He has two sons aged 13 and 16 years respectively, and the elder boy has entire charge of the bees, of which he is very fond. He runs his sections, extracts the honey, introduces queens divides his bees and rears queens with a skill of which many a veteran might envy. He is already well known in the city, three and a half miles distant, for his honey, and talks about bees, and quotes authorities in the most intelligent manner. All his honey is sold in one grocery store; and, though he has a good yield this season, and has reached a fine profit, he cannot fully supply the demand at the store.—American Agriculturist for November.

Cows which are to give milk through the winter, says the American Agriculturist need to be fed with special care at this time. If possible, the flow of milk must not be permitted to decrease. Mangels and sugar beets are excellent, cut in slices and sprinkled with bran. The rule that good feeding brings good manure, should be kept in mind in a judicious care of farm animals during winter. Good feed in abundance is not enough; it should be given with regularity. The habits of different animals have to be studied, and treated accordingly. Scarcely any two cows or horses have the same appetites. It is important to so mix and change the feed that sameness may be avoided. A variety of food encourages healthful digestion, and upon this the profits of the owner largely depend.

The farmer should remember that animal heat is maintained by the food eaten. The more heat required the larger the amount of food must be used for this purpose. Food that is used by the animal for the production of heat cannot be changed into fat. You might as well expect to use the same pile of logs to build a house, and burn in the stove. This is not "mere theory," it is scientific fact, backed by the experiment. It follows, therefore that the corn and hay may be wasted though a crack in the stable walls as certainly and as rapidly as through a crack in the corn crib floor. It is simply a question of profit. Will it pay better to keep an animal warm by giving it comfortable quarters, or by, feeding an increased amount of corn and hay?—Farmer's Advance.

All vegetables that are grown for their leaves or stems require an abundance of nitrogenous manures, and it is useless to attempt vegetable gardening without it. To this class belong cabbage, lettuce, spinach, etc. The other class, which is grown principally for its seeds or pods, as beans, peas, etc., does not require much manure of this character; in fact, the plants are injured by it. It causes too great a growth of stem and leaf, and the earliness—a great aim in vegetable growing—is injuriously affected. Mineral manures, as wood ashes, bonedust, etc., are much better for them. For vegetables requiring rich stable manure it is best that they have it well rotted and decayed. Nothing has yet been found so well fitted for the purpose as old hotbed dung, though to the smell no trace of ammonia remains in it.

Very many families desire some inexpensive device for filtering rain and other waters to be used for cooking and table use. A cheap and very efficient filter may be made by using a spirit or wine cask, placing it on end with the head removed, and placing a faucet at the bottom to draw off the clear water. To fit it for a filter, take the removed top head of the cask and with a small bit bore holes all over it, then place four clean bricks or blocks of wood on the bottom, and on these rest the perforated top. Now fill upon it about four inches of charcoal chopped into small bits the size of peas, and over this put a layer of sand six inches deep. Impure water poured into the cask on top of the sand will become clear and sparkling after a little while, or as soon as all fine particles are worked out of the charcoal and sand. This filter will not need renewing oftener than once in two or three months.—Popular Science Monthly.

Winter Celery.

It is well known that market gardeners about Boston winter celery with great success. It is told that for this service they have "a house or pit made purposely. It might be called a small cellar. It is boarded and thatched so as to prevent leakage, at the same time allowing spaces for free admission of air, which can be opened or closed at will, or else a house on the level—narrow and long preferred—made so as to expel frost, with a door at either end for the admission of air. The floor is the natural soil, but care is taken that it should always be dry as possible, either by having the level above that of the ground outside of the building, or by some other method answering the purpose as well. The celery plants are removed to these houses on dry days, packed in the same position as if growing, often a light covering of soil placed about the roots as each line or layer is packed away. The doors are kept open every day for the admission of air every day when not too cold, as success depends in a large degree upon keeping the celery dry and cold as possible without freezing. Celery in small quantities can also be kept with reasonable success in cool cellars, packed in sand.

Putting Away Cabbage.

Before the ground freezes cabbage should either be pitted or stored away. They will withstand considerable frost without injury, but should not be allowed to stand until they are frozen as this seriously injures them. There are different plans of performing this work, and of course each claim their plan to be the best. One thing is sure, they will not keep any considerable length of time if cut off from the stalks and stored in a damp cellar. A few can be stored in this way to be used up as needed, but the large bulk should be stored away in dirt. If stored in the cellar, they should be packed close together, heads up—the same as they stood in the patch—and then covered with soil. Of course, this necessitates taking dirt into the cellar, to be taken out again in the spring, and as it has no special advantage over putting them out of doors, I can see no economy in following this plan.

Wintering Stock.

The farmer or breeder who most thoroughly understands how to prepare live stock for winter is he who makes it a point to get the largest possible amount of flesh upon the ribs during the summer. So, he who best understands his business during the winter is he who succeeds in maintaining all the flesh acquired during the summer, adding to this as far as he can. Cattle that go into winter in good flesh, if suitably protected from storms and cold, and properly fed, are easily kept up to the summer standard till midwinter, and with suitable attention the same will prove true of the remainder, up to the appearance of grass. The warmth of seven-twelfths of the year favors the interests of the feeder in the highest degree, both in the direction of putting on flesh and in retaining it; and it is only by inexcusable improvidence that the gain made during the larger and best half of the year is lost during the shorter and unfavorable half.

House Plants.

All plants for the house must have light, if not sunshine. A temperature of from 55 deg, to 70 deg. is better than warmer for varieties cultivated indoors. If the vases in a room where plants are grown are filled with water it does much toward making the growth thrifty. Judicious watering is positively necessary. It is a mistake to warm the water used. It should be drawn and left to stand until it is of the temperature of the room. There are plants that will be seriously damaged by too warm water. Too much water is also harmful. The earth about a plant indicates when it is thirsty; then it should be thoroughly watered. None of the ornamental pottery vases for holding plants have a hole for drainage; it is not required when the plant is cared for intelligently; the earth needs only sufficient water to supply whatever is growing in it. A little judgment exercised, and it becomes an easy matter to know how much water the earth in the water will absorb. An excellent plan is to try the soil with a slender stick, as cooks try bread or cake. To keep plants bright and healthy, the foliage should occasionally be gently sponged on both sides. This is particularly necessary for larged-leaved plants. All withered leaves and twigs should be picked off, and blossoms should not be left on too long, or others will not form in perfection. Newspapers pinned about plants will protect them when sweeping is done.

The Holy Ghost Flower.

From the Washington Herald.

The Botanical Garden in Washington is possessed of a rare curiosity now in the flower kingdom. It is a holy ghost or dove flower in bloom. The curiosity is from Panama and blooms annually. The plant grows from a bulb about the size of one's hand, and springs up in a single stalk, which is the size of a pipe stem, and resembling in color and general appearance a rush, and is about three and a half feet high.

At the top of the stalk, and for the space of probably six inches along its sides near the top, the flowers are located. They are about two and one-half inches in circumference, white as snow, appearing rather like white wax or marble, and of the shape of a cup, with the mouth inclined outwardly. At the bottom of this cup-shaped blossom is the most lovely specimen of nature's art. It is the dove, which occupies a sitting posture, with wings extending upward, and exhibiting the first half of the dove. In front of the dove is an altar, slightly sprinkled with diminutive dots of maroon coloring, and this is the only color about the bloom. At the base of the stalk are three shoots or long leaves, like the shoots to new corn. There are twenty-five of the cups on stem, and the fragrance is very delicate and sweet. It is a great curiosity, and is attracting a large number of visitors. The dove specimen is kept in the green-house where the air plants are, which are nothing but blocks of wood, kept in a temperature so hot and damp they are forced to grow and bloom, and these alone are worth seeing.

A Plea for Separate Beds.

From the London Lancet.

More quarrels arise between brothers, between sisters, between hired girls, between school girls, between clerks in stores, between hired men, between husbands and wives owing to electrical changes through their systems by lodging together night after night under the same bedclothes, than by any other disturbing cause. There is nothing that will so derange the nervous system of a person who is eliminative in nervous force as to lie all night in bed with another person who is absorbant in nervous force. The absorber will go to sleep and rest all night, while the eliminator will be tumbling and tossing, restless and nervous, and wake up in the morning fretful, peevish, fault-finding and discouraged. No two persons, no matter who they are, should habitually sleep together. One will thrive, the other will lose. This is the law.

Wit and Humor.

"Oh, yes," said the eldest Miss Culture at table d'hote the other evening. "I breakfasted yesterday with Mrs. Brainweight, and we enjoyed a delicious repast—excellent coffee, superior bread and piscatorial globes, done admirably." "What?" asked her friend. "Piscatorial globes," repeated the Boston maiden. "And what under the sun are they?" "I believe," said Miss Culture, drawing herself up stiffly—"I believe uncultured people call them fishballs."—Hotel Mail.

This is a baby. It is a girl baby. How sloppy its chin is! How red its eyes! What horrid contortions it makes with its face! See how savagely it kicks! How sour it smells! How like a demon it yells! Yet in a few short years some man will be half-crazed with wild suspense, worshiping the very air this being breathes, devoutly kneeling at her feet and franctically begging for one word, one pressure of the hand, even a look, which will give him hope.—[Philadelphia Call.

Lord Macaulay, passing one day through the Seven Dials, bought a handful of ballads from some street venders, who were bawling out their contents to a gaping audience. Proceeding on his way home, he was astonished to find himself followed by half a score of urchins, their faces beaming with expectation. "Now, then, my lads, what is it?" said he, "Well, that's a good 'un," replied one of the boys, "after we've come al' this way!" "But what are you waiting for?" said the historian, astouished at the boy's familiarity. "Waiting for! Why, ain't you going to sing, guv'nor?"

What to him was love or hope? What to him was joy or care? He stepped on a plug of mottled soap the girl left on the topmost stair, and his feet flew out like wild, fierce wings, and he struck each stair like the sound of a drum, and the girl below with the scrubbing things laughed like a fiend to see him come.—Chicago Evening Journal.

Durability of the Planets.

Professor McFarland of the Ohio State University, in a paper in the current number of the Siderial Messenger on the habituality of the planets, draws the following conclusions: "That the four large outer planets have not sufficiently cooled down to allow life on their surface such as we see on the earth; that Mars gives all telescopic and spectroscopic probabilities of conditions compatible with life as we see it; that the earth certainly for millions of years has been covered with multifarious life; that of Venus and Mercury we have no certain knowledge, and that the satellites are pretty certainly not fitted for such life as is on the earth; that in particular, our moon has no water and no atmosphere, consequently no climate or vegetable life."

ANCESTRAL GHOSTS.

Said to Haunt the Towers and Corriders of English Castles.

There has been some little astonishment among the gossips here (says a London correspondent of the New York Tribune) that the fire at Cortachy Castle has not caused more attention to be given to ghosts proper to that spot, or rather, to its noble owners, the Ogilvies, at the head of whom is Lord Airlie, now in India. It is strange how anything of this kind arouses the superstition latent among English people of the higher class. I am not profoundly acquainted with American superstitious vagaries, which I take to be of a theosophic or spiritualistic kind, but I am every day more astonished at the credence given here to thoroughly well established ghosts "of quality." A vulgar goblin or queer noises in a cheap villa tenanted by a tradesman are dismissed with contempt, but none of this offhandedness is shown toward ghosts connected with the peerage. Thus, when the late Lord Airlie died, as foreshadowed by the appearance of the spectre drummer-boy there was a tremendous hubbub in country houses, and twilight was made terrible by the recital of well-authenticated ghost stories without number. So frequent is the family gost, or banshee, that one grows to think it one of those things without which no gentleman's house is complete. In fact I know a very wealthy and clever man who has recently bought an estate and huge old mansion, and is particularly proud of a well-established local ghost who frequents the terrace at the back of the fine old Tudor house. "Thrown in, too," he says, rubbing his hands with delight, "without extra charge; not like those confounded Wardour Street ancestors."

There were strange circumstances connected with the last appearance of the Airlie ghost. The late peer was in the far West, I think at Denver, in Colorado, when the drummer boy was heard at Cortachy. Great consternation was felt at the castle, but it was agreed by all the elder members of the family that a death was not signified under less than two visitations of the spectre, who would in that case reappear on the eighth day. Precisely on that day the drumming was distinctly heard, and the next telegram from Denver announced the death of Lord Airlie. The question now arises, "Will the phantom survive the fire?"

Another celebrated ghost who makes his presence heard, not seen, is the coach-driving goblin. I know of three places haunted by this phantom. One is Donnington, the second is Littlecote, the third I have excellent reasons for not mentioning. The ghost makes himself heard at all three in a manner peculiarly startling and ghostly. As the host, his family, and friends are seated at dinner, they—I say distinctly they, not one dreamy, solitary person—hear the wheels of a coach grating harshly on the gravel of the drive up to the main entrance of the building, and are soon wondering who the belated and unbidden guest can be, when the carriage stops sharply at the door. When the servant opens it he can see no coach, and hear no sound, and returns greatly terrified. The guests are amazed, but the family know that a death is at hand among their kinsfolk. At times the coach arrives later in the evening. At Littlecote on the last occasion it was the men assembled in the billiard-room, after dinner, who were startled by the unearthly vehicle. Littlecote, as everybody in that part of the country is aware, is one of the finest old houses in England, and was the scene of the arrangement for James II.'s flight from England, and a hundred years before, of the terrible drama of Wild Will Darrell, an English version of the "Manfred" story. There is still to be seen the fireplace into which the child was thrown, and the place is pointed out where the ghost of Darrell's sister appeared to him, and a child in a ball of fire rolled in front of his horse till the animal fell, and in falling broke his master's neck. What is certain, is that the great Darrell property in Wiltshire, now worth forty thousand sterling per annum, passed into the hands of Judge Popham, who had been attorney-general at the time when Darrell should have been tried for murder. The Pophams still hold the estate, to which, it is averred, the heir never succeeds—that is, the direct heir. And death and misfortune are heralded by the sound of the spectre coach-wheels.

Precisely the same sounds were heard at the Scottish shooting-house I refrain from more particularly specifying. At the latter the company was at dinner, the hour for the Donington ghost, but at Littlecote it was while all the men were engaged at the unromantic game of "pool" that the carriage rolled up to the door. The persons who were present of course believe their ears, and support each other. As for myself, I have no theory or explanation to offer concerning ghosts. I have heard of plenty of them from persons whom I am bound to believe, but as an older man-about-the-world observed, "Verily, I have not seen them."

Now that everybody has agreed that the mystery of the Glamis is over, we shall have one subject the less for discussion in country-houses. Although not indorsed by the Lyon family, the story is generally accepted that the object secreted in the central tower of the old part of Macbeth's castle was an elder son of the house of Lyon, who was born of monstrous shape, and grew to monstrous size. The unhappy creature, who is said to have been an idiot, and eight feet in height, died after nearly attaining the honor, if it be one, of "centenarianism," as it is absurdly called. It, I mean the monster, was concealed, it is whispered, for the excellent reason that he was rightful heir to the Strathmore estates, and that if he had got loose, or his existance had been verified, the control of the property would have been taken away from those who have enjoyed it, and, like the late lord, made "ducks and drakes" of it during the present century. I do not vouch for this story, but apprehend that it is substantially true, inasmuch as it explains the otherwise inexplicable secrecy so rigidly maintained by the only three initiated persons, the Earl of Strathmore at the time, the next heir, if of age, and the father of Glamis. Of course, the Lyons who originally immured the unhappy monster defied the law; but this was only in accordance with the traditions of the family.

Cost of the Public Buildings.

Washington Correspondence Cleveland Leader.

The capital has cost $17,672,123, the patent office over $13,000,000, the treasury about $7,200,000, the Washington streets more than $4,000,000, the state department about $7,000,000, the navy nearly $4,000,000, the white house, two parks and public grounds about $2,000,000, the agricultural department $3,025,000, pension office, $137,000, work of art, painting and statuary $700,000 and more, and the Washington fire department over $200,000. In 1876 the state department had cost nearly $5,000,000; since then it has cost $3,199,824 more, and its new building is not yet completed. The library of congress in 1876 had cost a little more than $1,500,000, the botanic garden over $700,000 the post office department more than $200,000. Since the new post-office building has been erected at a cost of $86,112, and both congressional library and the botanic garden have been greatly improved. The new pension office cost $37,000, the court-house $75,000, the national museums $316,707, the bureau of engraving and painting $396,930, the government printing office $62,298, and the freedmen's bank building, which the government bought, $250,000.

AN INTERESTING THEORY.

The Law of Sex Discovered and Carefully Analyzed—A New Scientist Who is Likely to Cause the Great Darwin to be Forgotten.

From the London Athenæum.

The author claims to make known "a new discovery of a great law of nature, nothing less than that which governs the sexes, and whereby the sex of offspring can be controlled." He has worked for years at the subject, carefully counting the number of boys and girls in all the families of his acquaintance, summing up the characteristics and taking the portraits of the parents, and reading Darwin and other authors who have handled the question. The great discovery is the law that "sex is determined by what I shall designate as the superior parent; also that the superior parent produces the opposite sex:" that is to say, that if the husband is superior to the wife the family will consist mostly of girls, and vice versa. Hence, as the author explains, results the preservation of the balance of the sexes; for in the next generation the girls, inheriting their father's superiority, will in most cases produce families with a larger proportion of boys. In future there will be no need to pry in order to determine who rules the roost in one's neighbor's family—it will only be necessary to count the boys and girls in order to determine the point; hence it is to be expected that the desire for female offspring will scarcely remain so strongly developed in fathers as hitherto.

Dark complexion is superior to light, dark plants and trees are the most hardy and dark horses the best. A square forehead and prominent veins are "superior," a large prominent eye (which "indicates conversational powers" is the reverse. But the best indication of superiority is a large and prominent nose, Roman or aquiline fully third the length of the face. As an illustration of the method of summing up the characteristics of parents from the rules laid down, the several portraits of opposite sex given in the plates are hypothetically married, pair by pair, and their superiority or inferiority is estimated numerically, 100 being taken as a standard number; hence the number of children of either sex which such pairs ought to produce, according to the new theory, is arrived at. One of the most ill-favored of the ugly women is mated, for example, with the man with the head which is biggest at the top, and the result is that if the pair have twenty children they will all be girls.

Then come a series of cases from the experience of the author. M. B., a man of genius, with large head and slender body, with a corpulent wife of moderate intelligence, had five daughters. Mme. A., a strong woman with masculine voice and slightly bearded chin, had seven children, all sons.

"I became acquainted with a man of good address, with a well shaped head and Roman nose. His wife was of consumptive tendency, of literary tastes, but with an infantile nose and an expression of general inefficiency. Imagine my surprise when I found they had three boys."

But the law remains unshaken: "All was satisfactorily explained," the husband was extremely illiterate and addicted to drink. "Nothing more surely degrades the nature."

Philosophers; lawyers, editors, poets, literary men and brain workers generally have a large excess of daughters. Wine merchants, tavern keepers, small retail dealers, orators, physicians and musicians have a preponderance of boys. Clergymen appear just to struggle through the ordeal without incurring the stigma of inferiority, being equally intelligent, sober and moral with their wives and producing an equal number of boys and girls.

Of course, for the stability of the new law it becomes necessary to show that musicians, medical men and orators are inferior. Accordingly the first are lymphatic, the second are made rather than born to their profession (and the most distinguished as an exception have large families of daughters), and mere public speakers do not possess "the highest order of faculties or intellect," while in most of them "the base of the brain will be found to predominate over the superior portion."

Were the theory established no married member of the learned professions would be able to get any employment at all unless they had large families of girls. They could not afford to run risks, and it would become a matter of common prudence with them to secure idiots for wives for fear of mishap.

A Queer Recognition.

When Jane Welsh, who married Thomas Carlyle, was a girl, she was so full of life and energy as to be a match for the boys in running and leaping. One of the feats, which made her famous in her village, was the ease with which she could surmount a wall, seven feet high, around the cemetery.

Years afterwards, when she had become an old lady, she re-visited the village, but walked the streets without being recognized by any of the companions of her youth. A single action, however, betrayed her. She had made an arrangement with the sexton to be at the cemetary, at early morn, to unlock the gate. She was present earlier than the appointed hour, and after waiting some time grew impatient, for she was eager to look at the graves of her revered parents.

In her vexation at the long delay, she remembered the feat of her girlhood, and though the suppleness of youth had gone, she managed to repeat the feat with tolerable ease. One of the old residents saw it, and soon after, meeting her in the cars, ventured to ask,—"Is not this Jeannie Welsh? I thought it must be you, for there was never another girl in town who would get over the wall in that fashion."

Setting a Broken Neck.

Near Syracuse, Mich., John Ibotson and his son Robert, of Troy, fell fifty feet from the roof of a building on which they were working yesterday. When Ibotson, who weighs more than 200 pounds, was taken up he was completely paralyzed, and his neck was dislocated in precisely the same way which commonly results in cases of hanging. His arms and legs were powerless, his head immovable, and his body so devoid of sensation that he did not feel a pin thrust into him. As life was not extinct, the doctors decided to try and repair the dislocation. Two strong men seized his feet, two more took hold of his head, and then they pulled in opposite directions with all their might, while the doctors manipulated the bones of the neck. It was three hours before the man's neck was set. When the pressure caused by the displacement of the bones of the neck was removed from the spinal column the man raised his arms and said he felt better. Anæsthetics were next applied, and the patient said that he felt no pain during the operation. He has been taken to his home in Troy. The doctors say he will recover.

SONG OF THE BREEZE.

Softly sighing to the river
Comes the lowly breeze,
Setting nature all a-quiver,
Rustling thro' the trees,
Thro' the trees.
And the brook, in gentle measure,
Laughs for very love,
While the poplars in their pleasure
Wave their arms above.
Yes, the trees, in very pleasure,
Wave their leafy arms above.

Yet the breeze is but a rover:
When he wings away
Brook and poplar mourn a lover,
Sighing, well-a-day!
Well-a-day!
Ah, the wooing and undoing
That the rogue could tell!
When the breeze is out a wooing
Who can woo so well!
Ah, the tales the rogue could tell!
Nobody could woo so well.
—W. S. Gilbert.

A PLOT FOR A FORTUNE.

"Well, doctor, what's the verdict. Am I condemned to death, or are you going to reprieve me?"

"I think I can reprieve you. But I can't promise to do more."

"I never expected it. I know my state quite as well as you—I haven't a year's life in me. Now don't begin to talk the usual rubbish; you ought to know me well enough by this time. Can you give me six months?"

"Not in England."

"Where?"

"Somewhere in the South—say Nice or Cannes. Nice by preference."

"All right. Nice by all means. When can I travel?"

"Early next week, if you rest the remainder of this."

Mr. Fletcher gave a dissatisfied grunt as he turned himself in his bed.

"Look here, Maitland," he said, when he had settled himself into a new position; "if you think that at my time of life I'm going to gad about foreign countries by myself you're mistaken. You'll have to come with me."

The doctor smiled; he was pleasantly surprised to hear his patient make the suggestion, but he did not wish him to see how gratified he was.

"What is to become of my practice meanwhile?" he asked.

"Oh, your practice must take care of itself; look upon this journey as a holiday taken rather earlier than usual. See me safely to Nice, put me into the hands of a good doctor there, and then you can leave me to end my days in peace. I think you will do that for three hundred and expenses?"

"I would do it for less," was Maitland's reply.

"I don't want you to. I'm rich enough, as you well know, to pay well for what people do for me. What do you suppose I want to keep my money for? I can't take it with me, can I, eh?"

"Not beyond Nice," replied the young doctor, using the freedom which this eccentric patron liked.

"Good, and I shan't want much there; I can't make much of a hole in my property in six months, however hard I try; though I believe that young scamp of a nephew of mine will grudge me my daily drive."

Maitland was silent; it was not his place to foster the breach between uncle and nephew, whatever his private opinion of Fred Dexter's character might be.

"You have a father, haven't you?" asked the old gentleman, after a pause.

"Yes; he is still living."

"Then treat him better than my son treated me; it will make him happier, if it doesn't make you."

"I wish you would let me speak to you about your son," said Maitland.

"Thank you; I'd sooner hear you on any other subject."

"I don't often trouble you with this one."

"No; or I should change my doctor."

"You have done him injustice, at all events," said Maitland rather warmly, "and I think you will live to repent it."

"In that case you must make me live longer than you profess to be able to do," retorted the invalid. "Don't renew the subject, please, till I ask you. Come in to-morrow and we will make final arrangements about the journey."

Maitland knew Mr. Fletcher intimately enough to know that the interview was over. He left the room and proceeded on his round of afternoon visits, reaching his small house about an hour before dinner.

A letter was waiting for him. It was directed in a lady's hand and bore the postmark of Nice. He read it through twice, apparently enjoying the perusal; then he lay back in his chair and thought.

"It's a stroke of good fortune, most decidedly," he soliloquized. "Amy is at Nice, and now I shall be able to go and see her. That will be a pleasant surprise for her, I hope. I'm afraid she doesn't get too many of them. Luckily Mr. Fletcher will never guess the reason of my recommending Nice; after all, it is just as good for him as any other place, and I may be doing him a greater service than he dreams of in taking him there, if things fall out as they should."

In the midst of this reverie the servant entered, bringing him another letter.

"Please, sir, this came this morning, but you don't seem to have seen it."

Maitland opened it, not with the alacrity he had shown with the first. It ran thus:

DEAR MAITLAND—How is the old boy? This question will savor of nepotic affection or interested selfishness: you may take your own meaning. Just because I am among the sharks again, and until I can pacify them with a feed on my uncle's accumulations, they are insatiable. I want to know, as a matter of business, how long he is likely to linger on the earth if he has made a will in my favor, as he knows very well I shall not be sorry to see it proved. Why should I hesitate to own as truth that which he taunts me with every time we meet? Could you lend me fifty till the time comes? Charge 50 per cent if you like. Tell me the truth about my uncle; I can bear it even if you give him five years longer. I shall bear it still better if you confine him to five months. Yours,

F. DEXTER.

"Heartless brute!" thought Maitland, on finishing, "though certainly he never makes a pretense of being anything else. It's fortunate for him that his uncle knows so little about him, or his chances of succession would be considerably smaller."

He scribbled a note in reply to the letter, simply informing Dexter of his uncle's intended journey and of his state of health. He omitted to give any opinion as to the probable length of his tenure of life.

Dr. Maitland was still a young man in his profession, though he was thirty-four years of age. He had entered it late. His prospects were fairly good, but hitherto his practice had been restricted. In a country town it takes time for a new man to make a position, as every family of standing already possess a medical man and is unwilling to change. However, he did not despair of getting on. He had every reason for wishing to do so, for he was desirous of getting married. He was not yet even engaged; he had secret reasons for not proposing at present to the girl he loved. Whether he would ever be in a position to do so was more than he could as yet foresee.

Mr. Fletcher had been his patient during the last five years—in fact ever since he began practice. This was partly because he had quarreled with all the other medical men of the town, but chiefly for a reason that he would never own. This was that Maitland had been a great friend many years before of his only son Charlie.

Charles Fletcher was of a very different stamp from his father. The latter was, as a rule, selfish and arrogant—diligent in business and economical in habits. He had bred his son up in his own footsteps, but had found that he could not mould his character as he wished. Charlie was inclined to extravagance, held the opinion that money was of no use unless spent, thought that life should be valued for its opportunities of pleasure rather than of gain, and in countless ways ran counter to his father's life-long maxims. Quarrel followed quarrel; the fact that he loved his son so well only made the father more bitterly resent the want of affection and respect with which he was treated, till one day the crisis arrived.

Mr. Fletcher had determined that his son should marry early, hoping by this means to make him settle down. He informed him of his wishes accordingly, pointing out that he intended to make his future prospects depend on the propriety of his selection. Charlie postponed the matter as long as possible, until at last a confession became inevitable. He was married already.

This put a stop to all hope of reconciliation. There was a violent scene, during which the father refused to recognize the marriage, and told his son he must shift for himself. This Charlie said he was quite ready to do, and that his father need not fear any application for assistance from him. If money made men behave like his father, the less he had of it the better.

A year afterward Charles Fletcher died in Paris. His father refused even to make inquiry as to his wife, but was informed shortly afterward of her death, also, by a paper sent to him from some unknown quarter. He said nothing to any of his friends, but his health gradually broke down, and from being a robust, active man, he became in the course of a year an invalid. A second attack of paralysis was the immediate cause of Mr. Maitland's last visit, and no one knew better than the patient that his days were numbered.

"Ah, well!" he used sometimes to say, "I don't want to live and several people want me to die—the majority ought to have their wish."

However, when Mr. Fletcher found himself at Nice, with its charming surroundings and delightful climate, he almost began to have regrets that he must so soon bid farewell to existence.

"I wish, Maitland, I had come here sooner," he said one day. "Why didn't you order me here long ago?"

"It wouldn't have done you any good, and I thought you preferred England."

"So I do to live in; but this is the sort of place to die in."

Maitland made no attempt to turn his thoughts; his patient always resented it if he did.

"I hope you are having a pleasant time here as well," continued Mr. Fletcher. "I don't want to monopolize you, you know."

"Thanks; I think I've shown you I can leave you alone occasionally."

"I didn't know you had friends here. Who are those people I saw you talking to this morning in the garden?"

"The Kestertons; I only know them slightly."

"H—m!" coughed Mr. Fletcher. "I should have thought you knew one of them rather well. She's a pleasant-looking girl."

Maitland tried his best to look unconscious, and flattered himself he succeeded.

"Oh, I know the one you mean," he said, "but she isn't one of the Kestertons; she's a Miss Fletcher."

"Same name as mine? Well, Fletchers are common enough."

"Yes, but not such Fletchers as she," remarked Maitland.

The old gentleman did not reply; his thoughts had evidently wandered back to old times. Maitland was careful not to disturb him; he had noticed lately that his reveries had become more frequent, and that they seemed to soften the acerbity of his nature.

They were seated on the terrace, where they often came to watch the passers-by; it seemed to please the invalid to see the gay life of which he could no longer be a partaker.

The young doctor was still sitting silently when he was interrupted with: "Bring her here; I want to speak to her."

He looked up and saw the young lady of whom they had been speaking approaching them. By her side ran a little girl seven or eight years old.

"Do you wish to know her?" asked Maitland.

"Yes; why should you be afraid of me? I'm not likely to be a rival."

Maitland felt this was a home-thrust; the old man's eyes were keen enough yet. He went forward to meet Miss Fletcher, closely watched by his patient.

"Amy," he said, "I want to introduce you to a patient of mine. Oddly enough he has the same name as you. You will do him and me a kindness if you will talk to him a few minutes."

"With pleasure, sir," replied Amy, adding in a half whisper: "So it is a kindness to you for me to talk to some one else, is it?"

"Sit down here, my dear," said the invalid, after a few minutes' general talk. "Maitland, will you take little missy to see that wonderful cactus at the end of the terrace? I want to talk to Miss Fletcher a little."

Maitland obeyed, glad to find that he had interested his patient in a new direction. He took little Cissy's hand and marched her off toward the cactus, though she seemed scarcely to like leaving Miss Fletcher.

She soon began talking about her, and found that her companion was an appreciative listener. Not only that, but he asked questions about her, a most unjustifiable proceeding, of course; but he salved his conscience by arguing that nothing Cissy could say would alter his opinion of her governess, and it was very pleasant to hear her praises sounded by a disinterested observer.

At the end of a quarter of an hour they returned to the seat. Amy rose as they approached.

"Maitland," said Mr. Fletcher, "I am going to stay out here for another hour or so; you had better accompany this young lady home. You will find me here when you return."

Maitland did not make any very lengthened protest.

"How do you like my old friend?" he asked when they were quite out of hearing.

"I think he is delightful," was Amy's reply.

"What did you talk about?"

"All sorts of things. He asked me a lot of questions: how old I was—that was very rude, wasn't it?—and about my father and mother, and how it was I lived with the Kestertons."

"And what did you say?"

"I told him that you could tell him more about me than I could myself. He seemed rather surprised. I should not wonder if you came in for a cross-examination this evening."

"Did he ask you to come and talk to him again?"

"Yes. Why?"

"I suppose because he liked your society," replied Maitland, wilfully misinterpreting her question. "Be sure you come to the terrace at the same time to-morrow."

"Yes, I will make a point of it, so you can consider yourself relieved."

"I may be relieved, but I don't intend to be dismissed again," replied Maitland, with a laugh. "I suppose I have no excuse good enough for coming in?" he added, as they reached the door of the villa hired by the Kestertons.

"I must leave you to settle that question."

"I have no excuse at all, but I'm coming in all the same if you will let me."

"It isn't my house," replied Amy.

"That is a very ungracious invitation," said Maitland, as he accompanied her into the hall.

When Maitland, half an hour later, returned to his patient, he found him talking with a man who was sitting next him. "He is making acquaintance to-day," thought the young doctor. As he approached, however, he saw that the supposed stranger was Mr. Fletcher's nephew, Fred Dexter.

"Ah! Maitland," was his greeting, "here I am, you see."

"Yes," put in the old gentleman, on whose nature his nephew always acted as an irritant; "'where the carcass is,' you know, Maitland."

"Oh, come, uncle, you're not a carcass yet," protested Dexter. "You might have blamed me with more reason if I'd waited till you were one before I came to see you."

"He seems to be under the impression that I shall be able to blame him after I'm dead," remarked Mr. Fletcher, sarcastically, to Maitland.

"Oh, come, uncle, I don't see why you should always put the worst interpretation on all I say."

"It won't bear any other," pettishly replied the old man. "Who told you I was here?"

"Maitland. I wrote and asked him about you."

"Do you mind letting me see that letter?"

Maitland here interposed and said he believed he had not kept it.

"That's a pity," said Dexter. "I should like to have shown it you that you might see what my letters about you are like."

"Let us go in," said Mr. Fletcher. "I'm getting tired. You will dine with us to-night?"

"Many thanks, uncle, but I've promised to see some people to-night."

"Who?"

"They are called Kesterton."

"Do you know them?" inquired Maitland rather anxiously.

"Oh, yes; very well. Do you?"

"Slightly."

"There's a very nice girl in the house—a sort of companion, or governess. She's called Fletcher; same name as uncle's. Odd coincidence, isn't it?"

"Come!" said Mr. Fletcher, peremptorily.

After dinner, instead of trying to get his usually nap, Mr. Fletcher sat in his easy chair, evidently in a very excited frame of mind. He seemed undecided what to do; he fidgeted about with one book and then another till at last he threw them down and called out "Maitland!"

"Yes."

"Let me see the letter that precious nephew of mine wrote you. You haven't destroyed it. I could see well enough that you were only trying to screen him. He said I could have read it if it had not been torn up."

"I have it, it's true," replied Maitland; "but I can't show it you without his permission."

"He gave it."

"But I told him I thought I had destroyed it."

"Very well; if you don't show it me I shall conclude the worst. It's clear you would let me see it in a moment if it was fit to be seen. Fred had better take care; he knows that he is my heir, but he doesn't know how near he is to having his expectations disappointed. I'm afraid he is a scamp, and it will be a bad job for him if he can't conceal the fact a few months longer."

Maitland did not attempt to defend Dexter, both his conscience and inclination were against such a course. He knew that he was, in spite of his advantages, a loose, untrustworthy and selfish fellow, and he had strong reasons for hoping that his succession to Mr. Fletcher's money might never become a fact.

The old man seemed inclined to talk this evening. He turned himself around to face Maitland, and said: "Who is Amy Fletcher?"

"She is governess at the Kestertons."

"Why? What got her the place?"

"I did," replied Maitland, looking rather guilty.

"H—m! you seem to take a considerable interest in this young lady. Has she any money?"

"None whatever."

"Then who paid for her schooling?"

"Her father left enough to cover most of the expense."

"And you supplied the rest?"

Maitland's look was sufficient to condemn him.

"It's a nice, romantic story," continued the old man; "when do you propose to marry her?"

"I don't know," replied the young doctor; "perhaps not at all."

"You mean she doesn't care for you?"

"No, I don't mean that; but I am in a very peculiar position in regard to her."

"What is the peculiarity?"

"Do you ask me to tell you?"

"Yes; why not?"

"I didn't like to do so without your asking me directly. I have reason to believe that she may be an heiress."

"I don't see why that should stop you."

"No, perhaps not; though people would doubt my sincerity in proposing to a girl so rich as she may become."

"It's very odd that an heiress should be a governess."

"She doesn't know who she is," exclaimed Maitland. "I am the only one in the world who does know. Suppose that I ask her hand—she may accept me; afterward she discovered that she is very rich: what will she think of me then? She will judge me to be the most despicable man in the world."

"Why not tell her she is an heiress, and then propose? If she loves you, the fact that she is rich will only add to her willingness to accept you."

"I cannot tell her, because she may never be so."

Mr. Fletcher looked puzzled. "There is more in this than you tell me, Maitland," he said. "You've treated me very well; I've taken a liking for you, and for the girl, too, for that matter. I should like to help you if I can, and feel I have done one kindness before it is out of my power to do any. How did you come to have this girl on your hands?"

"I knew her father and mother very well. They died abroad within a few months of each other. I was only a very young man then, as you may imagine; but they left me in charge of their only daughter, then scarcely more than an infant. My mother brought her up; when she was old enough she was sent to school, as I told you."

This simple recital interested the old man more than he cared to show. He could not prevent his voice from trembling as he asked:

"Is her grandfather alive?"

"Yes," was the reply.

"Why does he not support her?"

"He does not know of her existence. He quarreled with his son, who went abroad and died there, telling me never to let his father know that he left a child. I have kept the secret till now."

"You may as well finish the story, now you have gone so far," said the invalid, falling back in his chair. "What was her father's name?"

"Charles Fletcher."

"My son?"

"Yes, your son."

"Then Amy is my grandchild."

Maitland assented.

"She does not know it?"

"No; she is not aware of the existence of any relative. Your son made me promise she should be kept in ignorance of her relationship to you. I shall never tell her."

"That will do for to-night. I am tired and excited, my head aches abominably. I will go to bed."

Maitland came down stairs as soon as he had seen his patient attended to. He too felt excited and feverish. He determined to take a stroll in the cool evening air. His object had been accomplished: he had made known to his patient the existence of his granddaughter. Would the result answer his expectations. If so, what would it be his duty to do?

He was still revolving the matter in his mind, trying to look at it dispassionately as an outsider, and failing miserably, when he heard himself accosted.

"Hullo, Maitland, I thought I recognized you. Gorgeous night, isn't it? Are you in a hurry?"

"I must get back soon," was the reply.

"I'll walk with you if you don't mind. The truth is I've something very important to tell you. I've made a terrific discovery."

"Well," queried Maitland.

"You know that Miss Fletcher who is companion or something at the Kestertons? I got talking to her to-night pretty confidentially, and somehow happened to ask her the name of her father. You might have knocked me down with a feather, as they say, when she told me it was Charles Fletcher. You know who he was, I suppose?"

"Mr. Fletcher's son?"

"Just so. Sweet news for me, isn't it? I've always supposed myself the only relation the old boy has, and he has told me times enough that I'm his heir. Now if he hasn't made his will I shall be in a hole, for everything will go to this girl."

"She does not know about it, does she?"

"No, thank goodness! No one knows it but ourselves."

"Why have you confided in me?" asked Maitland.

"There you are, you see," exclaimed Dexter. "I hadn't decided whether to tell you or not, when suddenly you appeared before me, and that settled it. It seemed providential."

"That's scarcely a sufficient reason for your action, I'm afraid."

"No, by Jove! you're right. To tell the truth for once, I wanted to find out if the old boy has made a will, and I thought you were the one most likely to know. Then it struck me it was quite possible you might discover the secret without my help, as I know you are a friend of the Kestertons and acquainted with this girl."

"I've known it a long time."

"Have you though? My instinct was right. Did my uncle know that Charlie left a child?"

"No; he wished it to be kept a secret."

"Well," said Dexter, after a few moments' deliberation, "I'm not so safe as I should like to be. It seems to me I've only one course open to me, which will ensure everything turning out all right."

"What is that?"

"I must marry Amy."

Maitland gave a start. "Marry Amy!" he repeated.

"Yes. Why not? I must get engaged as soon as possible. When my uncle dies, if he has left me his property, I can break off the engagement if I want to without much difficulty; and if she gets it all for want of a will, I must press forward our marriage. You see I'm showing my confidence in you in telling you my plans beforehand, as I take it for granted you mean to let Amy know who she is after my uncle's death, unless he leaves everything to me by will."

"You are quite right," replied Maitland, stiffly. He had recovered his calmness now, and had need of it all to restrain himself. "It certainly was my intention to let her know. I do not promise you I shall not tell her at once, in order that she may have an opportunity of urging her claim."

"Oh, confound it all, Maitland, what good will that do? Let it stand as it is for a time at any rate. Give a fellow a chance. You see, as it is, I can make love to her as a man with good expectations, and she's only a poor governess; but reverse our position, and where's my chance? No, you must let matters stand for a week or two."

"I won't promise anything now," replied Maitland. "I shall see you to-morrow, and will tell you my decision then."

He turned away without even saying good night. Dexter was such a mixture of apparent good nature and selfishness; he had such a way of taking him into his confidence and making him a sort of partner in his disgraceful plans, that Maitland was disgusted beyond measure. And this was the man who was his rival for Amy! And his own hands were tied!

He rose early, after an almost sleepless night. He found that his patient was out of sorts, evidently the result of want of rest. He made no allusion to the events of the previous day; both of them seemed unwilling to start the subject. However, in the afternoon, Fletcher said:

"Maitland, I wish you would send to my nephew's hotel. You know it, I suppose?"

"Yes. Are you going to the terrace this afternoon?"

"Yes; the same time as yesterday. I want to see Amy."

Half an hour afterward Dexter made his appearance. Mr. Fletcher asked Maitland to leave them and rejoin them on the terrace in an hour. As he went out, Dexter managed to whisper:

"You won't tell her?"

"No," replied Maitland firmly.

The interview between uncle and nephew was rather long. Mr. Fletcher told Dexter that he was not so ignorant of his doings as he supposed, and that he had for some time doubted whether he ought to let such a scapegrace be his heir.

"I was once harsh to my son," said the old man, "and I lost him. I determined to make every allowance for you. I don't ask you if you deserve it, but I should like to know what your plans are. Do you intend to marry?"

This sudden question took Dexter off his guard. Making up his mind on the spur of the moment, he answered:

"Yes, sir."

"Whom?"

"Well, it isn't quite settled yet between us. I have not declared myself yet; but, if I obtain your consent, I will do so at the earliest opportunity."

"Who is she?"

"She is the governess at the Kestertons," replied his nephew boldly. "You've never seen her, I suppose, but she is a very charming girl."

"No fortune, I presume?"

"I believe not."

"Then you can't marry unless with my money?"

Dexter rather uneasily answered:

"No, sir."

"Very well," said his uncle. "I have no objection to your making a love-match. I tell you what I will do. It would be unsatisfactory for both of you if you, a rich man, were to marry her, a pauper. If you win her consent I will give mine, and make her heiress of half of what I have. You will then be on equal terms, as man and wife should be."

Dexter was growing more and more uncomfortable. This was far from the state of things he wished for.

"You are very thoughtful, uncle," he murmured.

"I should like to see this young lady," continued Mr. Fletcher. "I presume that by birth and education she is fitted to be your wife? You have made inquiries, I presume?"

"Well, uncle, I thought that would be rather wanting in delicacy. She is evidently a lady."

"Your sentiments do you honor, Fred. It was quite right of you not to make impertinent inquiries, especially considering her position."

Dexter felt he had done it now. It was impossible for him to confess that he knew Amy's identity. After a little further conversation they started for the terrace, where Maitland was shortly to meet them.

Meanwhile, the young doctor has been spending an unhappy hour. He was sure that Dexter would take the opportunity of telling his uncle his intention to marry Amy; the probability was greatly in favor of the old man's approval of his nephew's suit rather than of his—Maitland's. One thing he was sure of, that he must keep silent till Dexter had either won or lost, and that, if he won, he must keep silent forever. His only hope was that Amy loved him. Yet why should she? He had always been careful to treat her as a young sister; and if, occasionally, he had been conscious of saying something which was not quite appropriate for a brother, she had never given him reason for believing that she had ever contemplated the possibility of a closer relationship between them than had always existed. Yet, if he lost her, and to such a heartless scoundrel! No! he would never let her marry that other. Yet what could he do if she accepted him?

His mind was still full of the matter when he found himself on the terrace near the usual seat of the invalid. Mr. Fletcher and his nephew were already there, and close by them stood Amy. She had evidently only that moment arrived. Dexter rose, and, with considerable eagerness, offered her his seat and began to introduce her to his uncle.

"There is no necessity," interrupted Mr. Fletcher, "this young lady and I have met before."

Dexter looked surprised and annoyed. He had made good use of his time during the morning, which he had spent in the company of Amy, doing all he could to compress a courtship into a couple of hours. He had told her he wanted to introduce her to his uncle, but had not mentioned his name, and Amy never imagined that the uncle was the same old gentleman whose acquaintance she had already made.

At this moment Maitland came up. He took off his hat to Amy, and remained standing near.

For some time the conversation was to the last degree commonplace; not one of the men seemed inclined to be the first to broach the subject that each was thinking of. At last Mr. Fletcher, after a painful cough, said:

"My dear, I want to speak to you seriously for a minute or two. You will excuse an old man, who has not many months to live, if he says things a little bluntly. Try and suppose that he is afraid he has not time to do otherwise."

Amy looked surprised, but said nothing.

"My nephew," continued Mr. Fletcher, "has told me that he wishes you to be his wife. He has not, I believe, confessed as much to you, knowing that the possibility of his marrying depends on me. I have told him that, if he gains your consent, he will not marry a penniless girl, for I shall give you the same as I shall give him. So you see, you may rely entirely on your feelings in giving your answer; it will not be a case of marrying for money, but only for love. What do you say?"

Amy said nothing. She turned her eyes on Maitland, who persistently kept his averted.

"This is too sudden, uncle," pleaded Dexter.

"Perhaps it is," assented the old man. "I do not ask for a decisive answer now. Plead your own cause, my lad, during the next week, and then Amy shall give her reply."

Amy turned her head.

"There is no necessity to wait for a week," she said; "my mind is quite made up. I can never marry Mr. Dexter."

"My dear girl," persisted Mr. Fletcher; "do not make up your mind so swiftly. No doubt my blunt way of putting the matter has pained you. I can see you are agitated. Let me plead for my nephew. His love for you is disinterested; he knows you but as a charming young lady who is at present occupying a position unworthy of her. He knows nothing of you whatever beyond that; judge then whether you are treating him quite fairly in refusing to listen to him. It is not so easy to find young men nowadays who are capable of displaying such disinterested earnestness and devotion in seeking for a wife. He tells me he is even ignorant of the name of your parents. Does not that show he values you for yourself?"

Dexter had tried once or twice to interrupt his uncle, but in vain. However, he now managed to interpose with:

"Really, uncle, you appear to imagine that——"

But he was interrupted in his turn by Amy.

"Did Mr. Dexter tell you he did not know who my father was?" she asked.

"Yes," replied Mr. Fletcher, "and I applauded the delicacy of feeling he showed."

"I must tell you, then, that he did ask me, and seemed very surprised to hear his name. There seems to be some mystery about it, for its mention seems to have sufficed to turn Mr. Dexter from a casual acquaintance into an ardent admirer."

Dexter stood abashed; he did not attempt to defend himself.

"So, sir," said his uncle, severely, "it seems that you do know who this young lady is. I had my suspicions, and that is why I have said what I have, thinking I should catch you in your own trap."

"I thought you would be pleased if I married her," pleaded Dexter.

"Don't say another word, sir. Leave us now; come to my rooms this evening; I shall have something to say to you then."

Dexter walked away as carelessly as he could.

"Come a little closer to me, my dear child," said Mr. Fletcher in a tender tone, as soon as his nephew was out of sight, "I have some news for you. You must think me a very strange old man—so I am, perhaps. You think I have been very rude and unkind, but it was for your sake. No one is near us now; put your arms around my neck and kiss me and call me grandpapa."

Amy looked at him in astonishment for a moment and then glanced at Maitland. His look reassured her; she flung her arms around the old man's neck and kissed him.

"Grandpapa!" she exclaimed, "Is it true?"

"Yes, my darling. Ah, if I had only known it before! It's your fault, Maitland."

"Are you quite sure?" he asked.

"Well, no; I suppose it's chiefly mine. Do you think, Amy, you will be able to love me for the few months I have to live?"

"Oh, don't talk of dying, grandpapa; you mustn't."

"Ask Maitland."

"What must I ask him?"

"If he can spare me part of your affection for a time. Ah, I know all about it, you see; my eyes are not so dim yet but I have seen more than either of you imagine. Take her, Maitland."

Maitland did not hesitate long, for Amy's glad look revealed to him that her grandfather had judged her truly.

MARGERY DAW.

I'm in love, but I've never told her,
Never told the maiden I love;
I lie in the long green grass and behold her,
As she swings all day in the boughs above.
I'm a student with toil o'erladen,
And a student ever should books prefer,
But she's such a darling, dainty maiden,
My thoughts go swinging away with her.

See saw!
Margery Daw!
Up in the apple-tree Margery swings;
And I, lying under,
Watch her, and wonder
What is the ditty that Margery sings.

And she goes swinging; and I go slaving,
Turning the leaves of a musty book,
But surely that was her white hand waving,
And surely that was my darling's look.
A perfect fortress of books I sit in,
Ethics, economy, politics, law,
But all the pages I vow were written
By that little philosopher, Margery Daw.

See saw!
Margery Daw!
Up in the apple-tree Margery swings;
And I, lying under,
Watch her, and wonder
What is the ditty that Margery sings.

The light is fading, the day grown older,
And now the westering sun is gone,
And Margery, I no more behold her;
In the deep cool grass I lie alone.
For Margery she was a sunbeam only,
And I was a fool for all my pain,
But whenever I'm sad and whenever I'm lonely,
Back comes Margery, back again.

See saw!
Margery Daw!
Up in the apple-tree Margery swings;
For "Life's a dream,
And love's a shadow,"
And that is the ditty that Margery sings.

WHAT WOMEN WANT TO KNOW.

Children's Fancies.

To see that children are well protected from the inclemencies and changes of our all too variable climate is nature's fashion. For this there is the combination suit of flannel, covering them from head to ankle with equal warmth, woven in shape. These garments cost from $4 for children of three years up to $8 and $10 for larger children. With a suitable pattern the suit can be made just as health-giving at far less expense.

Scotch wool ribbed hose in black or dark colors is next thought of. These come high over the knees, held by a stocking supporter attached to the corded waist that holds drawers and skirts, thus making all the weight supported by the shoulders. The skirt should be a light flannel and white cambric for the house, a heavier flannel and cambric for the street; many, however, use the same skirts all the time; thinking the cloak adds sufficient warmth for the street. A kilted wool skirt and jersey is the fashionable dress for both boys and girls up to four years, made quite the same, only boys wear a jersey sash and cap; girls wear white skirts attached to a thin waist with a jersey all winter; the skirt should be uniform in warmth, of white cambric, tuck at intervals to the waist, with a fine elaborate needlework edging; the jersey is pretty for vest of pale pink, or blue; white, scarlet, maroon, garnet, dark blue or brown are all worn by children. Older girls have a collar to the jersey, and a sash in the back, to be worn with a side-plaited skirt of plaid on the bias, while boys wear the jersey with sailor collar tied with a ribbon or cord lacing in front, this with a skirt of jersey webbing, or kilted of cloth the same color; the jersey suit is pants fitting like the skin to the knee, the waist as described and a cap and sash. There is also a jersey long and loose at the bottom to bag in blouse shape. Older girls wear stylish tailor-made suits, and for house, silk or cashmere trimmed with lace or embroidery. Boys wear heavy suits of cloth knee breeches and hunters' jackets—that is, in box-plaits or pieces stitched to resemble plaits, ending in a short skirt and with a belt of the goods. Their overcoats are of rough beaver, blue or brown, with Astrakhan or velvet collar, cuffs and pockets, or of fine French cloth, if a warmer climate. Girls' cloaks are made with skirts plaited in the back and deep capes from the back seam falling over the arms to the waist line in front. Cord ornaments finish the back, also across the cape in front.

A Conception.

A St. Louis girl who is going to marry a Russian nobleman has had a dress created for her. This wonderful garment is composed, so far as material goes, of snow-white Radzimir (heavy cord) silk, brocaded white velvet, the bouquets on which are liberally treated to a sprinkling of hoar frost made of pulverized crystal beads put on with invisible sizing. The skirt short; the three front widths are of three deep Radzimir silk puffs at the top of the three breadths standing out full, pulled in with a heavy frosted cord. Below these are deep pieces of the frosted brocade cut in turrets, lined with white surah, to fall over a wide flounce of white Radzimir gathered in tufts or clumps, these groups of gathers coming together under a crystal three-cornered spike, like an icicle, under which is a small puff of the corded silk. The corsage is of chalk-white plush, cut in squares in front, fringed with these same royal icicles. The neck is low and square, the back Watteau, at the neck very full, and it sweeps in unbroken richness down the back, forming a queenly court train lined with Radzimir silk, with a band of white polar bear fur ten inches deep around it. The neck of the corsage in front is similarly trimmed with narrower polar bear. Around the neck is a collet necklace of polar-bear claws, each claw dipped in the pulverized crystals like hoar frost. The hair raised in a braided cornet around the top of the head is powdered with this artificial frost (which, by the way, is deadly treatment for human hair). On the left rises a bunch of white crystal-tipped marabout pompons—feathers encircled by a blazing circlet of first water diamonds, although Rhine-stones would be more effective. The sleeves stand up from the arm, size, four inches, these stuffed epaulettes being pointed upward with the icy spears; the sleeves proper, open on top, are thirty-six inches long, made of the brocade, lined with a small pappoose polar bear, icicles clinging in frozen beauty to the wide lower edge. Pointed, white crystal-studded slippers are worn with crystal embroidered hose of the heaviest white silk. The opera wrap to be worn over this dress of unexampled splendor is a Moorish circular, five yards around, of white corded silk, edged with intensely black fur and lined with ink black plush, which sets off the dead whiteness of the costume. The fan is of gigantic pattern, mother-of-pearl sticks, and made of white penguin feathers, with the monogram of the owner in small diamonds on both sides, set in the center, pearl and gilt sticks, which extends the whole length of the fan. This robe, it is expected, will be worn first at a legation ball, either in Washington or Paris. The owner is tall, graceful as a willow rod, with blue-black hair, small pink ears, a long white neck, smoky eyes of soft Irish gray, set in rings of black. She has a cunning little inky mole on her left arm, near the shoulder, which will intensify the creamy snow of her flesh, as the black lining to the mantle will set off the icicles on her epaulettes. An artist conceived this outfit.

Why Girls Disappear.

The mothers of our land, and especially our city, are beginning to wake up on the subject of daughters. One doesn't bring up a chubby baby girl to bang on a grand piano, outdress other girls and graduate with nuns' veiling and sixteen hired bouquets, to have some dark night bring a rascal and a rope-ladder to steal her away just when she is getting big enough to do the marketing and darn her father's socks. There is just now an epidemic of such cases, and the sympathy of the entire world goes out to the bereaved owners of these pretty girls, spirited away. Does the loose literature of the day, openly with the loosest morals, have anything to do with this serious turn of affairs? We all know that, without piratical romances and big Indian recitals, our boys would grow up plodding cash boys and voters, ornamenting the police board or standing behind plows and dry goods counters. And girls get hold of the worst books possible from each other, wherein the outside world is represented full of chewing-gum and new dresses, beaux and fancy balls. The fact is, the mothers of to-day do not exercise enough maternal authority and vigilance over their daughters. Girls form acquaintances and friendships to which mothers and fathers are utter strangers. Female chums call for them to spend the night, and who they meet while absent from the home circle mothers never know. School girls here have been seen year in and year out being joined on a certain corner by rakish-looking boys who carried their books and turned them away from homeward paths to take long walks down shady, unfrequented streets. They talked earnestly all manner of slop, the girls blushing and hanging their heads. Now what does this mean but disobedience and the road to evil influences and ruin? When the girl gets home, after dark, she tells a tale which ought not to, but does satisfy the loving hearts there, who would be blighted if harm came to their white lambs. Alas, the lambs are whitewashed—not purely white from innocence. No such sad affairs happen in England, where girls are kept under surveillance and better judgment rules; at least, not in good society. This country is being overrun with hoodlums, bad, vicious young men, who do an incalculable injury to all the innocent young beings they meet of both sexes. Mothers, keep an eye on your sons and daughters; do not fancy every tale they tell is true, but inform yourself, and you will not weep scalding tears so often when bereft of all you hold dear. Fathers do not have the care of children, at least of daughters; the responsibility rests with the mothers of girls. Fashion is turning the earth topsy turvy, upside down, and women at least are rapidly going daft on the subject of clothes—toggeries, not decent wearing apparel necessary to their welfare and comfort, but flummery, without which they could do very well.

Jewelry.

There are some exceedingly attractive styles in bracelets, and those most simple in character are the preferred ones. A pleasing pattern consists of crude gold pieces in form of small coins, set with precious stones. Another attractive design consists of irregular links, with here and there a colored stone, or a bug or fly represented by small gems. Lace pins continue in style, and come this autumn mostly in fancy patterns, odd designs being greatly sought after. Fancy brooch pins are gaining in favor, and another season the brooch will doubtless be generally worn. Limoges enamel, so popular now in jewelry, is employed with attractive effect on the lace pins. Ladies are affecting gentlemen's scarf pins, more or less, wearing these in these in the place of the lace pins. A French fashion introduced is that of two scarf pins connected with a chain of small diamonds or pearls. The style is very effective, and capable of many forms of ornamentation.

In earrings the screw rings, set with solitaires, represent a fashionable style, and the stones of contrasting color often occur in the same pair of rings.

Necklaces and pendants are fashionable only when set with fine gems. The necklace is worn over velvet quite tight about the throat, somewhat after the style of a standing collar.

Finger-rings are made for the most part with a wire shank, though any style that is simple or odd is permissible. For all rings the English setting is the preferred style. Broad rings are entirely out of date; so are large seal rings. Rings for the little finger are set with fancy stones and are without pendants.

The wedding ring is what dealers term a half-round ring; it is plain, and comes in eighteen or twenty-two carat gold. A solitaire diamond, sapphire or ruby figures as the gem for an engagement ring.

For gentlemen's rings are provided intaglios, sapphires, emeralds, and stones of a transparent nature. Their watches are plain or finished with a crude surface. Fob chains are out of fashion, and in their places are much worn the short, heavy English chains or light double chain.

Some gems are affected by acids. The opal is injured by potash, hence should always be taken off when the hands are washed.

Ladies' watches for ordinary occasions are quite plain and small; even monograms are no longer accepted with general favor. The usual watch chain is short, light and small. It may be of gold only, or of gold and platina. These chains are just long enough to fasten in the buttonhole and reach to a little breast pocket that is made for the purpose in many of the silk dresses.

Chatelaine watches and chains are no longer seen on the street, but are reserved for dress occasions only, and then, to be quite correct, they must be fancy in style and match in their decorations. Limoges enamel and gems are employed for the ornamentation.

Ball Furs.

Ball dresses trimmed with fur are certainly innovations and novelties, whatever we may say and whosoever howls hoarsely about the absence of anything strictly new and unheard of before in our wardrobes. Years ago young girls thought themselves very elaborate in their white taffeta gowns and capes edged with narrow swan's down and opera squares for the head, trimmed in this airy way; but swan's down never made a stylish trimming and had a cheap look, no matter how lavishly used. The furs coming in for our ball dresses this winter bring strange colors and apparent costliness with them, which adds ever so much to their value as trimmings. This fancy, like many another, has been stolen from the stage princess "who frets her brief hour" on the boards and then goes to a club supper with a bald-headed admirer, who spends a whole month's salary of somebody else on this little affair, garnished with water-cresses out of season, wine a trifle dear and pousse cafe or maraschino with coffee so bitter as to suggest the wormwood which comes after all life's stolen pleasures. Yes, it is no longer the pleasant and proud office of the poor Empress, Eugenie to make our fashions, but the giddy young stage heroines, who generally have a divorce hanging over their blonde heads; if not, the interest is considerably lessened. Shrewd managers have little use for actresses who cannot rake up one or more husbands in litigation, and often other women's husbands. We can all remember the times when fashion-plates from the home of that poor woman, whose cup of sorrow has run over of late, were greedily seized, and dressmakers ordered to imitate her last gowns or morning wrappers to the t-y-ty. Since a republican nobody leads the quadrilles in Paris, we depend on our soubrettes, leading ladies and ballet sirens for new clothes, or else dream on the matter ourselves, doing fully as well as if we had the pretty empress back to guide us. In fact, no imperial set of dresses was ever richer than those being made for our free-born American queens, who will open our balls this winter. Nor are the elegant robes to be monopolized by our stately matrons; our young girls and debutantes are to take a hand in this pie, as they do in anything worth talking about.

The Language of Gems.

The furor that exists for gems possessing historic or other associations has had the effect of bringing to notice many stones that were highly esteemed, for one cause or another, by the ancients, and which, but for the present fancy, would have remained unknown to modern toilets. The fashion at present in vogue of selecting a gem for a birthday or wedding present, supposed to be sacred to the month in which the present is given, is a revival of an ancient superstition from which originated an amulet set with twelve zodiac stones, corresponding to the months of the year. This superstition was evidently connected with the twelve stones in the breastplate of the high priest. The order is as follows: January, jacinth; February, amethyst; March, bloodstone; April, sapphire; May, agate; June, emerald; July, onyx; August, carnelian or sard; September, chrysolite; October, opal or aquamarine; November, topaz; December, ruby.

There also exists, at the present time, the fancy, when making a present to a gentleman, of selecting a gem corresponding with his christian name. The stones employed are those formerly supposed to symbolize the twelve apostles. For instance, Peter is represented by jasper; Andrew, sapphire; James, chalcedony; John, emerald; Philip, sardonyx; Bartholomew, carnelian; Matthew, chrysolite; Thomas, beryl; Thaddeus, chrysophrase; James the lesser, or, as it is phrased in those days, James junior, topaz; Simeon, jacinth; Mathias, amethyst.

The language of gems is also considered nowadays, though, of course, not to the same extent as of old. The diamond is supposed to make the wearer courageous and magnanimous; the ruby is a preventive against plague and poison; the jacinth produces sleep and brings riches and honor; the amethyst dispels drunkenness; the emerald discovers false friends; the sapphire procures favor in high places, etc. Stones of a transparent nature, of high lustre and fine color, are all highly esteemed.

Rugs.

In the East rugs are made with no patterns to follow. Where one leaves the room to get dinner, another takes it up and runs in colors and figures on the inspiration of the moment. Through all these quaint conceptions, though, a certain sort of harmony runs, that comes of the native skill and taste of these simple people. In a rug that is simply Persian throughout, the centers are black on a dark ground. The figures, closely joined, are wrought in those peculiar shades of red and pink, etc. The border is of large figures on a Nile green groundwork, and runs between narrow bands of white shades, and the whole edged with an outer border in chrome yellows. A Mashupitan is an Indian make, very close woven, so that the minutest figures are distinct, giving a fine, rich effect. The colors are light. Another India rug is the Lahore. The quality approximates to that of the Mashupitan. The colors are deeper and the figures more obscure. A Rahndour (not "barn-door," although the larger sizes are very suggestive) has a blue ground well filled in with small figures. Japanese in a multiplicity of designs, but not specially so in their conception. They are largely geometrical, and the rest simply nondescript. Hardly a duplicate to be seen in both color and form, and their variety affords a theme for perpetual study. Nearly all tints, in light and dark colors, are among them. The border is a series of alternate triangles, based from either side, on a chocolate ground. An outer band is on a blue with small figures. A Berlin rug has a scarlet surface with a single medallion, in blended colors, in the center. It is an oblong square, with projecting, pointed ends and sides. The broad border, with corner pieces, is in dark blues, greens and blacks. Another Berlin has a rich, dark olive ground, plain center, the border an obscure tracery of diamonds, etc., in oak shades and blues on the Grecian order. A camel's-hair rug is peculiarly rich, the natural color of the animal (approaching an oak) contrasting with a border, the figures so small they present at a short distance almost a mottled surface of the rare shades of lemons, reds, orange and olives.

The Virtues of the Peach Pit.

Somebody wrote recently of a "new" industry, which consists in extracting the kernel from the stone of the peach, drying and putting up in small packages for sale at the druggist's. What we have not known always comes to us as a revolution with which the world has heretofore been unacquainted; and it is very fortunate that it is so, for it provides that perpetual system of review without which we should lose all we have known in trying to acquire more. It is true the uses to which the peach "pit" has been put are not so remote as to be classed among the lost arts, but its virtues are very little known and will bear restating. A number of years ago a little pamphlet was published which specialized its claims and described its beneficent results in the curing of dyspepsia. At that time peach-pits cost, at the stores where they were sold, 75 cents for a small package, and they have probably not decreased in value, although in the peach season every ash barrel is filled with them because they are not considered worth the labor of extracting from their shells. But apart from their medical value, which they owe to the presence of prussic acid in considerable quantity, they ought never to be separated from the fruit in cooking, on account of the delicious flavor they impart to the peach itself. Peach pies made of whole peaches, without an under crust, are Hyperian to the Satyr like product on concocted out of split peaches from which the "stone" has been extracted and inclosed between two so-called crusts. Canned peaches lose immeasurably by leaving out so important an auxiliary to flavor and assimilative properties, and many housekeepers who buy all other fruits ready prepared can their peaches at home, as the only way by which they can secure the invaluable union of the peach with its kernel.

An Indian Princess.

Mrs. Sarah Winnemucca Hopkins, daughter of generations of chiefs of the Piutes and sister of the present chief, is on a "mission" to the East, and in prosecution of it has been the guest of Mrs. Elizabeth Peabody and her sister, Mrs. Horace Mann, for the past two months. Miss Peabody is now accompanying her protege on a speaking tour and has been the recipient of much attention from ladies and societies who are interested in the "Indian" question. The "Queen of the Piutes," as she is sometimes called—although women in reality hold no rank among the North American Indians—is far superior in intelligence to any other of her race that has been known among us. She is full, round and compact of figure, with a face which lights up with extraordinary expression and animation when she becomes interested. She speaks eloquently of the women of her tribe, and defends them from the charge of ignorance and inefficiency. She says they are exact in the performance of their duties, are clean and teach their children all that they know which is useful to them. She asks that the agency system may be abolished; that her people may be furnished with agricultural and other implements, allowed to own land and farms, like other citizens, granted the rights of citizenship and also that of earning a living and pursuing peaceful avocations unmolested. At a private house, last Sunday evening, she wore an Indian dress of light-gray wool, profusely trimmed with bands of embroidery and with beads and fringes, the former a kind used in this way only by the wives and daughters of chiefs, and which are commonly employed as money.

Children's Hats.

Girls are wearing larger hats and bonnets in proportion this season than women. A shove crown, with a large front that pokes out over the face, is a favorite style; they come both in felt and velvet. A lovely bonnet for tiny girls, as well as young ladies in their teens, has a box-plaited front of velvet (fluted it is termed) and a puffed crown. A double row of ribbon on the top, a little gold or silver tinsel on the edge to brighten, gives a stylish bonnet for a youthful face in velvet. The Sea-shell, which was worn in straw so much during last season, is reproduced in plush and velvet, trimmed with ribbon and small pompons on the back, and worn far off the head with full ruchings of lace or ribbon across the front resting on the hair. Then there is a variety of hoods, caps and turbans for children, of wool, cashmere and satin, that are pretty and warm. Quilted hoods, covering the head and ears, are again worn by little girls. Boys wear turbans of Astrakhan or seal, the oval crown and rolling brim hat, Jersey caps and the Turkish fez. Collars for boys are of linen with needlework edge, or of striped linen with the edge buttonholed in scallops, either round or sailor in shape, tied with a ribbon at the throat.

Plumage.

Mantles are made of colored velvet, and are especially elegant in dark red or brown broche velvet, combined with repped terry velvet of the same color, and trimmed with a great abundance of black Escurial lace. The small bonnet is chosen of a color to match the mantle, and those together may be worn with a dress of almost any color, as contrasts are quite as stylish as matching in the toilets of to-day.

Very stylish and fancy ulsters are of London smoke, or of dark blue cloth made with several close flat pleats from the throat to the hem, and a full pleated back that can be looped up with buttons.

Square plain front breadths and trimmed side-panels are on the imported serge dresses. The drapery is very slight, but is worn over a large pillow bustle. The vest basque is short and jaunty.

The fronts of elegant dress skirts are covered with tassels, tabs, loops or pointed ends of ribbon, or of beaded hanging bars, that shake and glisten with every motion of the wearer.

Old-time Maltese lace designs are copied in creamy white silk threads by the lace workers in Dresden, and are used to trim evening dresses of batiste or gauze.

The birds worn on bonnets made in this country are very modest in size and color beside those worn by ladies who bought their hats in Paris.

Moscow-green, Russian-gray, Czar-brown and Cossack-blue, which is almost gray, are the preferred colors for Muscovite velvet.

One of the handsomest silk fabrics of this season is black satin de Lyon brocaded with fine cut jet beads, woven into the fabric.

Bands of velvet worn around the throat are ornamented with a diamond crescent, a locket, or some bit of jewelry in front.

The Gallic cock in metals of all colors—gilt, steel, bronze, or silver—and also in feathers, is a very fashionable ornament.

Russian Pachott and elephant-gray, Czar-brown, royal French-blue, Moscow-green and violet-purple are very fashionable.

Golden-brown cloth suits with real gilt braid are made by Paris tailors in the styles in favor with English ladies.

Long close-fitting cloaks, trimmed with five-inch bands of fur, are being made by the tailors for the coming winter.

Scotch cheviots and Irish friezes will be the favorite materials for winter jackets.

Velvet spots are introduced into Spanish laces intended for dresses and bonnets.

Cheviots come in stripes, checks and large blocks, in all the combinations of colors.

Double balayeuses of muslin and lace are inside the skirts of short velvet dresses.

Embroidery cut out and applied on woolen and silken stuffs will be much used.

For the short coats, the Melton and West of England cloths are very popular.

Large balls and spots are the newest designs for Oriental and Spanish laces.

Felt corduroy bonnets are a pretty novelty for morning and traveling wear.

Plaited camel's hair bonnets will be worn with cloth and cheviot costumes.

Waistcoats of plastrons, plain or plaited, appear on almost all new corsages.

Costumes of velveteen, tailor-made, will be worn on the streets this winter.

MORNING SONG IN "CYMBELINE."

Hark—hark! the lark at heaven's gate sings,
And Phœbus 'gins arise,
His steeds to water at those springs
On chaliced flowers that lies;

And winking Mary-buds begin
To ope their golden eyes;
With every thing that pretty bin,
My lady, sweet, arise;
Arise, arise!

The gross earnings of the St. Paul & Duluth for the first eleven days in November were $65,402,59, an increase of $9,842,86, compared with the corresponding period of time in 1882.

General News Gossip.

Mrs. N. L. Sholes, wife of the express agent and deputy postmaster, at Waverly, Iowa, disappeared from home. She was gone when Mr. Sholes came to his supper, and he found the table set only for one, and a note lying near his plate, written by his wife, stating that she did not want any supper, and had gone to take a walk. Her body was found in Cedar river. During a part of the summer she was out in Dakota, holding down a claim, while Mr. Sholes remained in Waverly, and some one wrote to her that Mr. Sholes was seen on the streets late at night with a woman belonging in the family who rented the house. Since her return to Waverly she has received similar letters. She had also been sickly for some time. This, together with her sensitiveness over the letters undoubtedly led her to commit suicide.

Capt. R. Blakely has returned from Leech Lake Indian agency, where as special agent of the government to confer with the Pillager band of Indians with regard to adjusting their claim for damages to their fishing and rice interests caused by tearing away their dam. The commission were absent about two days, during which time a confab was had with Flat Mouth and his tribe, which numbers 1,500 bucks and squaws. The report will not be ready for some days, but the commission will recommend the payment of some damage and the removal of the tribe to White Earth agency.

A petition is being circulated and is receiving many signatures to open the Red Lake Indian reservation for settlement and for sale. About one-third of this reservation is the finest agricultural land of the West, is well watered and interspersed with small tracts of hard wood timber, and is easily accessible to market. The balance is covered with heavy pine timber. There are now about 700 Indians living on this reservation, and they occupy but a small tract of land lying on the south and east shore of Red Lake.

Mrs. Beach of Hartford, Minn., obtained a writ of habeas corpus commanding her husband, now living at Toronto, Canada, to procure the body of their child in court. The writ is returnable next week. A motion for the child's custody will then be made. Mrs. Beech in July began divorce proceedings against Beech, and he fled to Canada with the child. The wife, who lives in Minnesota, sued and obtained an order for the custody of the child.

Footing up receipts of iron ore in Cleveland, the great distributing point for the Lake Superior mines, have been made by the Trade Review and Western machinist for the season of 1883, just closing, showing a total of 663,807 tons against 993,048 tons received in 1882. The total shipment the past season has been 644,331 tons, against 678,785 tons in 1882.

Maria Perry of Rockland, Mass., ran away from home and in a few years returned with a husband whom she introduced as Joe Lobdell, who later on was found to be a woman. She was imprisoned, but when she came out of prison the girl Maria lived with her again, with whom she has remained for years.

The National league has postponed the meeting it proposed to hold at Atlanta, Ga., Nov. 21, and instead thereof James Negley, president, has called a meeting at the Ebbet house, Washington, on the 12th of December. The republican national committee will meet at the same time and place.

The Criminal Record.

R. P. Pickert has been arrested in Boston on an indictment found against him in St. Louis for operating a "gift enterprise" establishment, and held in $1,500 to await the arrival of extradition papers. The business is said to be in connection with the Consolidated Tea company, which has just opened a large store in Boston, and offers great inducements in the shape of prizes to customers.

Prists and McCullough, arrested in Milwaukee for shooting the car driver (Grothe) in the face and back, when they attempted to steal his cash box, confessed the deed on the 14th inst. The accused are boys who are addicted to dime novel reading. The police have evidence of their work as highwaymen in other cases. The detectives who made the arrest get $500 reward. Grothe is still alive.

John Ansley, a well known insurance agent, of Bloomington, Ill., formerly a resident of Dayton, Ohio, was arrested the 16th upon a charge of embezzlement. The charge was preferred by the postmasters of La Salle, Ill., whose funds Ansley—as agent of his property in this city—appropriated to his own use.

Frank E. Starke killed E. R. Allen in a Vicksburg theatre. Being interviewed, Starke admitted that he had no provocation to commit the act, and attributed it to his bad temper, though he expressed no regret. Allen was a native of Brooklyn, fifty-five years old. Starke is a native of New York, twenty-two years old.

County Controller Speer of Pittsburg, Pa., entered a criminal suit against A. H. Rowland, clerk of the court, charging him with embezzlement and defalcation during two terms of office, the sums aggregating nearly $47,000. Rowland was arrested and gave bail of $10,000.

Foreign News Gossip.

The latest official account of the fighting at Toka states that the Egyptians lost eleven officers and 142 men, besides six Turks and several Greeks. They also lost one gun and 800 rifles. About 340 regained their ship. The Egyptians during the fight formed a hollow square, when a small number of the enemy locked their shields together and rushed through the Egyptian line. An immediate panic among the Egyptians resulted. It is doubtful if black troops can be spared from Massowah, which is in the same critical position as Suakim. The British gunboat ranger has been ordered from Olden to Suakim.

There is a general strike of railroad and steamship laborers at Panama. They demand an increase of wages from $1.50 to $2. There are so many canal laborers on the isthmus and such great numbers are constantly arriving, that the strike, it is thought, will be a short one. All is quiet. The national troops at the railroad depot have orders to fire on them in the event of an outbreak or overt act of the strikers.

Another Call for Bonds.

Secretary Folger has called in $10,000,000 of 3 per cent. bonds numbered as follows, original numbers, both inclusive:

$50, Nos. 847 to 887; $100, Nos. 5,447 to 6,840; $500, Nos. 2,335, to 2,564; $1,000, Nos. 16,451, to 17 401, and 22,646 to 22,665; $10,000, Nos. 24,726 to 25,658.

This call makes the sum of the calls for the current fiscal year a trifle over $71,000,000. There is a batch of $15,000,000 called for Dec. 1, another for the same amount Dec. 15, and this one for $10 000,000, for Feb. 1. There are, therefore, no payments contemplated for January. In addition to these three calls of 3 per cents, amounting to $30,7000.006, was within this fiscal year. Treasury officials think the debt reductions for the year will at least equal $100,000,000.

FATAL RAILROAD CASUALITY.

Adam Gotzian of St. Paul and His Wife and Niece Dangerously Injured.

Thursday at 6:20 a. m. a party of ladies and gentleman, numbering about fifty persons, left St. Paul, by the Albert Lea route, for a trip across the continent. The party was made up of residents of St. Paul, Minneapolis and Sauk Rapids, as follows:

Wyman Elliott and wife, Hiram Van Ness and wife, William Blaisdell and wife, O. B. Sturtevant and wife, Miss McLeod and a lady friend, D. B. Murray, James Stanchfield and wife, C. C. Curse, wife and daughter, Charles Cypher and wife and daughter Susie, Max Smith, wife and son, E. Bachner, Miss Mary Stark, S. M. Whitney, all of Minneapolis; C. W. Chase and family, Mrs E. W. Chase, G. W. Hendrickson, E. A. Bates, Miss Kate Nichols, Charles Brimbell. W. A. Wessenger, of St. Paul; Mrs. G. M Bennett and daughter, of Sauk Rapids; H. Wilson, of Richfield; Mr. Barnum of White Bear.

Early on the morning of the 16th the train to which the two special cars bearing the party were attached met with an accident at Jamesport, Mo., a station on the Southwestern branch of the Chicago Rock Island & Pacific road sixty-five miles this side of Kansas city. A number of passengers in the rear coach discovered that something was wrong. The bell chord was reahed for, but the train was going at the rate of about eighteen miles an hour, and before a halt could be made, the rear coach struck a curve, bounded from the track, broke the coupling, and rolled over an embankment about fifteen feet high. The coach turned completely over once, and almost over a second time before it reached the bottom, the rest of the train proceeding some distance before coming to a standstill.

In the car at the time the St. Paul excursionists were scattered about, a number being in the end where a roaring fire was blazing and as the terrible plunge was made they were hurled against the hot stove, the hot coals at the same time being forced from the stove, setting the clothing of two of the ladies on fire. The scene that followed almost baffles description, but as several of the men at once stamped out the fire the danger from that source was over.

The list killed and wounded, so far as known at the present time, is as follows:

Killed—Adam Gotzian, St. Paul; skull crushed.

Wounded—Mrs. Adam Gotzian, spinal injuries and scalp wound; which will probably prove fatal. Miss Anna Gotzian, neice of Adam Gotzian, two dangerous scalp wounds extending length of head; will recover. Mac Smith, Valley City, Dak., badly cut and bruised. Mac Smith, Jr., cut in head. Mrs. Mac Smith, injured internally, scalp wound and face cut.

G. W. Hendrickson, ex-county superintendent of schools, St. Paul, rib broken and scalp wound; W. A. Wessinger, St. Paul, severe scalp wound and badly burned from coals from stove; Ernest Bachner, Minneapolis, face and head burned; M. S. Nichols, St. Paul, agricultural implement manufacturer, badly bruised and cut; Miss Kate Nichols, right arm badly bruised; S. M. Whitney, Minneapolis, slightly injured. Adam Gotzian is a well-known real estate dealer of St. Paul, and is also associated with Albert Comnick in the retail dry goods business. He is a brother of Conrad Gotzian, the well-known wholesale shoe dealer.

The Report of the Wisconsin Capitol Disaster.

The four architectural and building experts summoned by the state house building commission to investigate the cause of the collapse of the south wing have made their report. They find that—

The disaster occurred on account of the weakness of the second story iron columns, or of the masonry supports beneath them, or of both combined. The brick pilisters or piers extended upward from the basement through to the floor of the second story. Each was two feet square. There were no capping stones on them, but an iron plate one foot square rested upon each. The ommission of a capping stone was a grave mistake. From this iron plate rose iron columns, which upheld the roofs. The weight borne by the column was concentrated on too small an area of masonry, the top of which perhaps, crushed more or less under the plate. We estimate that the second-story column, if made as called for in the specification, would safely carry seventy-five tons. The load it would ultimately have to carry we estimate at ninety tons. The third and fourth story columns, however, as called for in the specifications, would have been strong enough to carry their loads, and so would the girders and floor beams. The iron columns were very defective. They were not cast true, being often three-sixteenths of an inch on one side and one and five-sixteenths on another, and often having sand-holes, cooling-seams and other flaws and defects, and some being patched. It is impracticable to say what the defective columns would bear, but they were much weaker than if they had been of uniform thickness called for in the specifications, and had been good sound castings. We regard the masonry as fair ordinary work, calling for neither special praise nor blame.

More About Land Frauds.

A Washington Special says: As a result of the special service appointed to investigate cases of illegal and fraudulent entries any appropriation of the public lands, since Nov. 1, 108 entries under the pre-emption, homestead and timber culture laws have been held for cancellation. The majority of these entries were in Minnesota and Dakota. Within the last three days there have been twenty-one cancellations. Most of the pre emption laws, the lands having been entered by persons hired by the land speculators. Since the organization of this service, which took place in Marsh last, 1,500 cases of fraudulent entry were reported, 800 of which were completely examined; over 850 cases were cancelled or held, for cancellation, and twenty-six suits recommended to set aside patents fraudulently procured.

MINNESOTA NEWS.

Duluth's new 500,000-bushel elevator will load vessels by pipes. It will be done when navigation opens.

Gen. Baker, the railroad commissioner, is daily in receipt of complaints growing out of the refusal of local railroad agents in many places throughout the state to furnish cars for shipping wheat. This class of complaints, the commissioner says is becoming too numerous, and measures will be adopted at once, if possible to remedy the matter.

A number of Princeton people have filed on Mille Lacs reservation claims, and are determined to hold them at all hazards.

The Lutherans of the town of Bancroft, Freeborn Co., will build a new church next year on the site of the old one. The new edifice will be 38x60 feet, with tower 100 feet high.

Peter Czizek, city treasurer of Moorhead, was last fall indicted for the embezzlement of $15,000 of city funds. This, he says, was done by officials because he had transferred his bank account. Last week the court dismissed the case on the ground that there is no evidence against him of any shortage, and Mr. Czizek remains treasurer.

A Real Enoch Arden.

Forty-two years ago William Anderson lived on a farm near Barnesville, Belmont county, O. In 1842, he was married to Miss Mary English. They lived happily together twelve years, and in that time eight children were born to them. In 1853, Anderson took the California gold fever, then raging in the United States, and started on an overland journey to make his fortune, leaving his wife and children behind. At first he communicated with his wife and sent her money, but as the years passed by letters ceased to come, and he was mourned as dead. During all these years the wife worked hard to support the helpless children. They grew to maturity—five daughters—and three sons—and they all won respectable positions in society. Believing her husband dead, Mrs. Anderson consented to marry Jessie Fowler whose death was announced a few weeks ago. Before the second marriage which occurred about eighteen months ago, she was wise enough to obtain a divorce from her first husband. One of her sons, George Anderson, even when a child, believed that his father was not dead, and often said that when he became a man he would go and search for him. Eight years ago, he went to Idaho to better his fortunes, but also with the hope of meeting his father, and they have been living together ever since. A few days ago the father and son returned to Ohio. Mr. Anderson visits his children near the home of his wife, who is now in mourning for her second husband, but he has not entered her house, although he has conversed with her in the presence of mutual friends.

Hospitality.

A story comes to us from Canada which if true shows in a clear light the base nature of the snobbish bride which regulates its behavior to men and women by their rank in society.

The wealthy owner of a country-seat near Quebec, who had long sought admission into fashionable society, saw, one day, two ladies seated on a rock in his lawn, drawing in sketch-books a picturesque bit of landscape. He hurried angrily down to them.

"What are you doing here?" he demanded.

"Sketching," was the calm reply.

"You had better look out for other subjects for your studies," he blustered. "I don't choose the designs of my landscape gardener shall be made common."

The ladies, whom from the plainness of their dress, he supposed to be poor teachers, rose instantly and went down to the road. He followed at a little distance and saw them enter a carriage which was in waiting.

"Who was that lady?" he asked of a gaping passer-by.

"The Princess Louise."

"What! the Princess Louise! are you sure of that?"

"Yes, sir."

The man went to his house, horrified at his act, the churlishness of which became very apparent, when he found it was a member of the royal family that he had snubbed.

LATE MARKET REPORT.

ST. PAUL.

WHEAT—The week opens with the market steady at about Saturday's quotations, the growing strength of the outside market still encouraging holders to maintain their extreme position, notwithstanding the freer movement of wheat in the country. May's hotel at Elizabethtown, Ky., was set on fire by incendaries and burned to the ground. Loss $25,000.

Biggar, M. P., in a speech at Oldham, Lancashire, stated that Spencer, lord lieutenant of Ireland, had had innocent people hanged upon notoriously false evidence. He also declared that the Orangemen were unimportant in number and composed of knaves and dupes. When Stafford Northcote visited Ireland a torchlight procession was only organized after the men composing the procession had received half a crown each.

Joseph Goodwin sued the Southern Express company at Montgomery, Ala., for $50,000 damages for false imprisonment. During the adjournment Goodwin was stabbed in the breast and back by A. A. Adams, a messenger employed by the company. The wounds are serious. Goodwin had stated that Adams stole a watch for which he was arrested.

Description of a Bull Fight and the Ladies Who Attended It.

Charles Dudley Warner gives this humorous account in the November Century of a fashionable bull fight at Seville, and describes the ladies in attendance:

The ladies of Spain, except in some remote town in the mountain regions, have laid aside the national costumes and dress according to the dictates of Paris, preferring even the French fans to their own decorated with the incidents of the bull fight and the serenade. In Seville the black lace mantilla is still worn at church, and to some extent on the street; but the hat is the cover of the new fashion, more's the pity, and the high combs have gone altogether. I do not know why a woman, even a plain woman, should be so utterly fascinating in a mantilla, thrown over a high comb and falling gracefully over the shoulders, stepping daintily in high heeled shoes with pointed toes, and moving her large fan with just that nonchalant air so accurately calculated to wound but not to kill. In the whole assembly I saw only one or two national costumes—the mantilla and the high comb, with the short petticoat, brilliant in color. Nothing could be more becoming, and it makes one doubt whether woman's strongest desire is to please, and whether it is not rather to follow the fashion, when we see a whole nation abandon such a charming attire. But the white mantilla is de riguer for a bull fight, and every lady wore one. It was a little odd to see ladies in the open light of a brilliant, cloudless day, and in the gaze of public, in full—as it is called—costume of the ball room; but the creamy white mantillas softened somewhat the too brilliant display, and threw over the whole the harmony of subdued splendor. What superb Spanish lace, blonde, soft, with a silken luster, falling in lovely folds that show its generous and exquisitely wrought figures, each leaf and stem and flower the creation of dainty fingers! Such work as this, of such a tone and fineness in such large mantillas, sweeping from the head to the train, is scarcely to be found in the shops nowadays. These were heirlooms—great grandmother's lace, long yellowing and growing rich in locked chests, worn only on state occasions, and now brought forth to make a bull's holiday.

We spent a good deal of the waiting time in scrutinizing the packed seats for beautiful women, and, I am sorry to say, with hardly a reward adequate to our anxiety. I am not sure how much of the beauty of the women of Seville is traditional. They have good points. Graceful figures are not uncommon, and fine teeth; and dark, liquid, large eyes, which they use perpetually in millades destructive to peace and security. And the fan, the most deadly weapon of coquetry, gives the coup de grace to those whom the eyes have wounded. But the Seville women have usually sallow, pasty dead complexions. Perhaps the beauty of the skin is destroyed by cosmetics, for there was not a lady at the bull fight who was not highly rouged and powdered. This gave an artificiality to their appearance en masse. Beauty of feature was very rare, and still rarer was that animation, that stamp of individual character, loveliness in the play of expression, and sprightliness, that charm in any assembly of American women. No, the handsome woman in the ring were not numerous enough to make an impression on the general mass, and yet the total effect, with the blonde lace, the artificial color, the rich toilet and the agitation of fans was charming.

Great, But a Failure.

A loving, gentle boy was Samuel Taylor Coleridge. When he was an old man, known as poet, philosopher, and conversationalist, his tender, gracious, benign face made his friends adore him. The sympathetic nature of the boy shines out in an incident of his school days. He was rushing through the street to be in time for school, when he ran against an old woman's apple-stand and upset it.

"Oh, you little devil!" she shouted after him, as he rushed on.

Looking back, he saw the mischief he had done. Instantly he returned and gathering up the scattered fruit, apologized for his heedlessness.

"Oh, you little angel!" exclaimed the mollified woman, as she patted his head.

He carried the same loving heart through life, but not the same energy to amend the blunders of his own life. He attracted great men by his spacious, subtle intellect, and fascinated them with his marvellous power of "talk."

Wilson, the severest of critics, spoke of Coleridge's conversation as "eloquent music without a discord; full, ample, inexhaustible, almost divine." In his loftiest moods he spoke like one inspired. The ear was delighted with the melodious words that flowed from "an epicure in sound." But there was little nourishment in these musical utterances of one who seemed to have given himself up to "the lazy luxury of poetical outpouring."

Though Coleridge was the best of talkers, he was the worst of doers. Indolence and opium-eating begat this discrepancy. His slavery to what he called "the accursed drug," impaired his mind and embittered his life. His genius was mastered by his indolence. He never learned that no genius is great enough to exempt its possessor from patient industry.

His friends environed him with great expectations. He died fulfilling scarcely any of them, because he had neither the industry which works steadily, nor the energy that makes one achievement a stepping-stone to higher attainments.

Such a life is full of warning to young men of genius. It says to them: "You will fail, unless you learn in youth to bend your neck to the yoke of persevering industry and keep yourself free from the slavery of an evil habit."

Anecdote of Thad. Stevens.

It is related of Thaddeus Stevens that shortly after his removal to Lancaster in 1842 he heard of the sad prostration of an old friend in New York, a lawyer, who, pressed hard by necessity, had diverted to his own use $300 due to a certain widow client, hoping soon to regain his financial footing and repay her. But "unmerciful disaster followed fast and followed faster," until the poor fellow's mental distress was actually killing him. Mr. Stevens hunted up the client, paid her from his own pocket the $300, obtained her receipt, and went to see his friend. "Hallo! old fellow," he exclaimed, on entering his office, "you must wake up. Don't be so down-hearted. Say, don't you suppose you've really gone and paid that woman and then forgotten all about it?" A despairing shake of the bowed head was the only reply. "Well, I believe you did, and I'm going to look through your papers and see if I can't find the receipt." Then he pretended to ransack some pigeon holes, and a moment later exclaimed: "Well, if you're not the biggest fool I ever heard! Look here, old man! What's this?" So saying he showed the receipt to his astounded friend, who thereupon recovered his spirits, and, happily, his business fortunes also. Afterward he repaid Mr. Stevens, and the latter never was able to find out how his generosity had been detected.

Personal Matters.

Dick Luke is the owner of a whole coal mine in Michigan, and yet he is not much of a capitalist, for it is a very small property. He personally works the only tunnel, into which he crawls in the morning, to get out an average of a ton of coal before night.

Rev. John S. Inksip, the veteran Methodist revivalist, camp-meeting conductor and editor of the Christian Standard, was stricken with paralysis a week ago at his home in Westown, Pa., and has since been in a precarious condition.

Senator Justin S. Morrill, of Vermont, will be seventy-five years of age at the expiration of his term next year.

Mackay, the bonanza king, is said to be working hard to make up the defects of his early education, and burns the midnight oil over his books.

Fanny Davenport walks twelve miles per day to keep her figure from its former enbonpoint. While her form is thus rendered as beautiful as it was twenty years ago, her face is wrinkled and old in appearance. She is said to be forty years of age—and is probably forty-five.

Attorney-General Brewster has probably the most tastefully arranged office in Washington. It is on the second floor of the old Freedman's Bank building, looking out upon Fifteenth-st., Pennsylvania ave, and the White House grounds. In the centre of the room is an elaborately carved, flat-topped mahogany desk, at which the Attorney-General sits, and signs his name with a quill pen. Mr. Brewster usually wears a velvet jacket in his office.

Judge Tourgee, who has lost the bulk of his fortune trying to publish a cultured magazine in Philadelphia, proposes to get even by writing a novel on Philadelphia life. One of the newspaper of the derided city suggests as a title, "The Fool and his Money are Soon Parted."

Frank Rande, the terrible bandit who killed five men in a cornfield near St. Elmo, Ill., in 1878 and topped of with killing a policeman in St. Louis, is serving a life sentence in the Joliet, Ill., prison. He puts in his spare time inventing fire escapes, long-range guns and new systems of telegraphing. He has also taken a hack at "perpetual motion."

Prince Edward, the son of the Prince of Wales, has been entered as a student of Trinity College, Cambridge. It is stated that he is not to attend the ordinary lectures, and special tuition will be provided for him; but he is to keep chapels and halls. In the chapel the master's pew, on the right of the master's stall, has been given up for the use of the prince and his suite. In hall he will dine at the high table, sitting on the right of the president; and he is to wear a silk gown instead of the ordinary blue stuff one of the Trinity undergraduate.

Mr. Martin F. Tupper, whose exploits on the back of the winged horse Pegasus have given him so peculiar a place in literature, has been lecturing on "flying." He is reported as expressing the belief that "some condensed form of tame dynamite" might be utilized for the benefit of those who fain would fly. Of course. "Poetry," Mr. Tupper well knows can be made tame enough. But the trouble would seem to be, Mr. Tupper, that dynamite like the tongue, cannot be tamed. Even a small and unobtrusive case of it has been known to tame several able-bodied men in one round. But where is the dynamite tamer? Who is he that can so work upon its disposition as to render it gentle and harmless? Has Mr. Tupper the art of breaking dynamite, like "poetry," to harness?

Madame Modjeska to a reporter of the Cincinnati Commercial Gazette said: "I mean to retire from the stage after two years more, while I am in full possession of all my powers. To me there is something inexpressibly sad in the last years of actors and actresses who linger on the stage. Last year I met Janauschek—sick, pale, feeble. She had lost nearly all her large fortune trying to sustain her great reputation before a public that cared no longer for her when her powers began to wane. 'Why do you not retire?' I asked. 'Alas,' she said, 'my love for the stage kept me, until I am forced to play in order to insure a living.' I have no mawkish sentiment about it—I love the stage because it has been good to me, but it is an exacting mistress, and I shall foreswear allegiance to it while I am in a position to do so gracefully and creditably."

President Lincoln's Dream.

It is not generally known that President Lincoln once dreamed that he would be assassinated. While he was neither a professor of religion, nor even fixed in its belief in one particular creed, still he was fond of reading and discussing the bible. On Sunday evenings he invariably read a chapter or two from the scriptures, and then gave his explanation of it. The Nashville (Tenn.) Liberal says:

One evening at the White House he had read several passages both from the old and new testaments relating to dreams, to which Mrs. Lincoln and the children gave great attention. He began to chat with them on the subject of dreams, and said he had been haunted for some days by a dream he had had. Of course, they all wanted him to tell it, though Mrs. Lincoln said she didn't believe in dreams in the least, and was astonished at him. So he proceeded to tell it. "About ten days ago I retired one night quite late. I had been up waiting for important dispatches from the front, and could not have been long in bed when I fell into slumber, for I was weary. During my slumber I began to dream. I thought there was a stillness about me, and I heard weeping. I thought that I got up and wandered down stairs. The same stillness was there. As I went from room to room I heard moaning and weeping. At length I came to the end room, which I entered, and there before me was a magnificent dais on which was a corpse. Here there were sentries and a crowd of people. I said to one of the soldiers: 'Who is dead at the White House?' He answered: 'The President.' 'How did he die?' I asked. 'By the hand of an assassin,' was the reply. Then I heard a great wailing all over the house, and it was so loud it seemed to awaken me. I awoke much depressed, and slept no more that night. Such was my dream." From that time until his sad death Mr. Lincoln was haunted by the fear of assassination, and Mrs. Lincoln's first words after Wilkes Booth had shot him on April 14 were: "His dream was prophetic." The remark was not understood then, but when the story of his dream was subsequently told it was explained.

Socialism in London.

Socialism is lifting its head prominently in London. Social theories are now debated in places where, even in the revolutionary period of 1848, they would have been regarded as ridiculous. The Liverpool Mercury's correspondent remarks: "A well-known East end curate was describing to me lately some experiences in the neighborhood of Whitechapel. He is accustomed on the Sunday evening, after preaching his sermon, to take off his white tie in the vestry and to sally out to the haunts of the people under his charge. His favorite resorts are the haunts of the political orators, for there, he says, he gets to learn more clearly than elsewhere what are the longings of the people. The orators themselves, generally ignorant and blatant, are not particularly helpful, but their audience are. One can see when they are touched, and it is especially affecting to watch the women—generally hardfaced women—who have had to fight for their virtue while young and for honesty ever since, and who nevertheless have not found life yield any pleasures, and snatch even an hour of political debate as a 'fearful joy.' Now, the general feeling among these poor souls is that 'something is wrong'—they do not know what, and hardly dare to guess, but things are not right with them; and though they shrewdly suspect that the loud-talking gentleman who proposes to set all things right by a revolution is wild, yet they insist that, if God made the world, there should be some remedy for evils worse than death."

Household Hints.

TARNISHED MORROCCO.—The lustre of morocco is restored by varnishing it with the white of an egg. Apply with a sponge.

KID SHOES—Kid shoes can be kept soft and free from cracks by rubbing them once a week with pure glycerine or castor oil.

TO STRENGTHEN VINEGAR—Freeze it and remove the ice which forms on the surface—the water of the vinegar alone freezes, leaving the acute acid in solution in the remaining water.

FOR A COUGH.—Roast a lemon without burning it. When entirely hot, squeeze the juice into a cup on three ounces of finally powdered sugar. Take a teaspoonful whenever you cough. It will scarcely ever fail to give relief.

TO MEND STOVES.—When a crack is discovered in a stove, through which the fire or smoke penetrates, the aperture may be completely closed in a moment with a composition consisting of wood ashes and common salt made up in a paste with a little water, and plastered over the crack. The good effect is equally certain whether the stove be hot or cold.

MARBLE POLISH.—To polish marble cut the surface with a piece of fine sandstone, using fine sand and water. When the whole surface has been equally gone over take a piece of felt or old hat warped around a weight, dip in fine emery powder and rub the marble until all the marks left by the former process are worked out. Afterward finish the polish with putty powder and fine rags.

BLACK WALNUT FINISH.—A process that requires neither filing nor oiling, and is said to make a very fine finish when plenty of muscle is expended on the work, is to mix equal parts of finely powdered pumice stone and burnt umber and rub on the mixture hard and long with a wooden rag dipped in linseed oil. Finish by rubbing off with old cotton cloths.

poses in his later life, perpetually held in check by an occasional crack of the whip rom an unseen hand in a distant hamlet. That single crime in his youth had put a yoke upon him, made him a slave, and balked every hope of his whole life.

Yet hard and pitiable as the man's fate seems to us, is it not immeasurably that of every man who gives away to vice or folly in his youth? No matter how sincere his repentance, or how pure and helpful his after life the ineffaceable marks of that early lapse into crime remain in soul and body. The man who frequents vulgar and vicious society or is a drunkard, gambler, or libertine at twenty will carry the taint with him into an old age and early grave.—Youth's Companion.

Fear Held Him.

Novel-writers have tried, with more or less success, to depict life in Washington; but if the real inside history of men and parties there could be given, it would surpass any picture in wild improbability.

Take for example the following bit of actual history. During the last generation, one of the most familiar faces on Pennsylvania Avenue was that of a well-known party-leader, who was popularly supposed to be an aspirant for the highest political honors.

He was known as a man of great intellectual power and unstained probity. He had control of vast national interests. His personal popularity was very great throughout the country, and his ambition was known to be unsatiable.

Yet when, time after time, high political offices were offered him, he refused to allow his name to be presented as a candidate. The reason for this was known only after his death, and then to but few persons.

In his early youth, under strong temptation, he had committed a crime which, if disclosed in after life, would have brought irreparable shame and disgrace upon his children. The facts were known but to two or three persons in an obscure country village where he had once lived.

These persons were not unfriendly to him, but they belonged to the opposite political party. When, therefore, his name was suggested as a candidate for a high national office, he received a quiet intimation from the inland village, that if he came before the people, the story would be made public.

We know no more dramatic figure in fiction than that of this strong, ambitious leader, with noble aims and true pur-

Woman's Work in a Mint.

Fifty females employed in the mint at San Francisco are called adjusters, and their pay is $2.75 a day, counting week days and all holidays, but Sundays. Their hours from 8 o'clock in the morning until 4 o'clock in the afternoon, with the exception of Saturdays, when they cease at 2 o'clock. These adjusters occupy two large rooms on the second floor of the mint. One is used for the adjusting of silver and the other that of gold. The floors are carpeted and each lady has a marble-top table, a pair of scales and a fine, delicate file. Before the gold is turned over to them to be adjusted it goes through the process of being rolled, annealed, cut and washed. They then take it in a state called "blanks," that is perfectly smooth, and the weighing is done. It is weighed to see it each piece be of standard weight, which must be of 4121-2 grains for a silver dollar, a slight discrepancy being allowed on either side. If a coin is found outside of the limit after being weighed by an adjuster, it is returned. If too light it is condemned, and must be remelted; if too heavy, it is filled to its proper weight. This is the ladies' work, and an interesting sight it is to watch the small white fingers deftly handling the shining pieces. A room near the adjusting-room has been set aside for the ladies, who use it as a lunch-room; two long tables are provided, and a janitress furnishes boiling water for making tea, and also keeps the place neat and clean. Several of the ladies have been in the mint for many years.

Bro. Cooke of the JOURNAL is wearing a long coat these days, and dragging it about that it may be stepped on, so that he may have some excuse for quarreling with somebody. If a person notices him at all, it is an insult, and he bristles with passion, and lets loose the dogs of war. Last Tuesday we good naturedly replied to an untimely thrust from him, and he tortures our reply into abuse of himself and the JOURNAL. If Bro. Cooke is distinguished for one thing more than another it is his unfairness in argument; and his reply to the Chronicle item is an evidence of this trait in his character. As to the assumption that he converted us to his ideas, he publishes the refutation in yesterday's paper. When we arrived at home after a month's absence, we were immediately made acquainted with the state of wheat matters, but not having data on which to base an article, engaged Mr. Geo. S. McManus to write the matter up for us. So comprehensive, and so convincing was the article spoken of, that the JOURNAL copies it at length, with the remark that is "timely and wise." We might go on for a column or two exposing the inconsistencies and fallacies of the JOURNAL's remarks but we have more important business on hand than to multiply words in a controversy gotten up for the purpose of showing how great an interest Bro. Cooke takes in the welfare of the poor farmers—since he got to be a poor farmer.

The above shows very plainly how much interest Bro. Dunn, of the Chronicle takes in a matter of so much public importance as is the stealing of the Millers' Monopoly. He says we are "wearing a long coat" &c &c, for the purpose of quarrelling with somebody, that is, in plain English, he would say that the JOURNAL is manufacturing all of these complaints against the Millers' Monopoly and parading them before the public, and all this on purpose to quarrel with him! We do not know whether this implies sublime innocence or unlimited egotism. He certainly flatters himself, to an unwarrantable degree when he assumes that we have engaged in this war for the sole purpose of a fight with him and he can not so construe our position unless he is in sympathy with the Millers' Association that is robbing this country of thousands of dollars and stagnating every business interest. We submit whether such is the case or not and allow his own words to decide the point. He says: "We good-naturedly replied to an untimely thrust from him &c." The "untimely thrust" he speaks of is our criticism of a local which appeared in the Chronicle which represented that the wheat was all being graded No. 1 Hard that farmers were all serene and happy. The "untimely thrust" he complains of was aimed at that organized band of robbers, the Millers' Association and could in no way injure Bro. Dunn if he was not one of them, or in sympathy with them. The fact that he persists in calling our criticism of the organized robbery an "untimely thrust" at himself would lead one to infer that we did step on his corns. Bro. Dunn's reply was certainly surly, if anything and as to our reply being unfair we published his article thus giving the public a chance to decide that point and are perfectly willing to abide the decision. As to Mr McManus' article if anybody was deceived as to it no one but the Chronicle man can be blamed for that, as it appeared in the Chronicle as a communication, signed by the writer and in such a shape that if the Millers' Association, the railroad or any other man had called upon the editor of the Chronicle to verify it he could in no way be held responsible for it under the ruling that all newspapers adopt that the editor is in no wise responsible for the sayings of whoever writes a communication for the paper. It certainly was not an editorial neither had the Chronicle ever given an editorial opinion on the steal until this controversy wrung one from him. We yet fail to see wherein Bro. Dunn can plume himself on Mr. McManus' article as it was in no wise editorial, even if paid for, appearing as a communication, nor do we see why he feels so very touchy and tender upon a matter which he pretends to feel so little interest in. If he is so blind that he can not see that this community is being robbed by the Millers' Monopoly why is he so quick to take exceptions to our criticisms of their robbery and try so hard to divert the mind of the public from the true issue by such laborious attempts to make it appear that the whole matter is simply a squabble between the JOURNAL and the Chronicle? If he is not personally interested why does he appear as an apologist for the thieves, insisting that everything is all right except in the JOURNAL's mind? If he has no personal interest at stake compelling him to defend the Millers' Monopoly he can hardly blame his readers if they get an opposite opinion. He seems to be very much in earnest for some reason or other in trying to convince people that everything would be serene if the JOURNAL did not go out of its way to roil the waters and stir up a row, and he would have them believe that we have raised all this fuss, that we are too blame because the farmers are systematically robbed and as he facetiously (?) remarks "since we got to be a poor farmer." We rather take exception to that too claiming to have raised as fine a lot of wheat as has been shown in this county this year and we don't call that "poor farming! As to our "lately" acquired interest we submit that the JOURNAL ever since it was established in 1877 has labored faithfully in the interests of its patrons and has ever preached the glories of the Red River Valley, advising "poor farmers" to come here to better their condition. This we have done conscientiously as we know that the soil is all right and will raise the No. 1 Hard wheat fast enough to satisfy the most grasping seeker after wealth, but when we see the hard-working farmer systematically robbed of from one-third to one-half of his wheat can we as conscientiously urge others to come here and be plucked? Can you do it, Bro Dunn? We at least are honest enough in our convictions of right and wrong to try and remedy the evil of which we complain before we urge people to come here to toil and slave for a soulless, grasping monopoly. We prefer to see an open market in which farmers can have at least a chance for their lives before we tell people that everything is all right out here and we believe, too, that we shall see that day and that right early, for a road to Duluth will provide an open market for wheat in Polk County, and since we commenced this fight on the Minneapolis Millers' thieving style of business, we have, received letters from prominent men assuring us that a road will surely be built and that at an early day. We had hoped to rouse the farmers to action in their own behalf and our efforts have not been wholly in vain in that direction if we may judge anything from the signs of the times, and from the many personal interviews we have had with prominent farmers in this and other counties, and whether the Chronicle ever takes a hand in the good work or not the day is coming, yea is close at hand when we shall have all we need, an open market for our wheat, until then we are content to wear that "long coat" and let Bro Dunn ride along on the tail of it until we all enter the broad sea of prosperity to which that good old coat is leading—we shall continue to cut and slash everybody who stands in front, leaving the cowards who dare not face the music but who linger in the rear, to the fellow on our coat-tail.

St. Vincent Herald: Every day we hear complaints from the farmers that they are being beaten and cheated by the elevator men. There is not the slightest doubt but that they have grounds for complaint. They daily bring wheat to market, the larger portion of which is pure scotch fife and should be sold as No. 1 Hard, which is being knocked down two or three grades. It is so all through the valley and will continue so until competion is secured. At present there is nothing for the farmer but to grin and bear it.

The Wheat Market

Grand Forks Herald: The state of the wheat market yesterday showed a marked increase as to receipts, and a corresponding reduction in price. The receipts at the White Elephant elevator are averaging nearly 2000 bushels per day, and nearly as much at each of the other elevators. This increase is attributable in a great measure to the ground freezing up and putting an end to plowing, the magnificent roads and the fine weather we are enjoying. The price paid yesterday for No. 1 hard was the insignificent low sum of 76 cents. How long will such an outrage upon the wheat producers of this great Northwest last is the matter of grave moment at present. Until the hardy sons of toil arise in their might and rebel against the great monopolies and rings of the East, just so long will they be compelled to submit to their dictations and be trodden to death.

GRIST-MILLS.

Talking with a farmer from the vicinity of Red Lake Falls on the vexed wheat question, he suggested the idea of a farmers' grist mill. His idea is for the farmers to unite in Farmers' Associations and build a mill for each Association to grind the wheat of each individual member, the wheat to be ground at such rates as to to pay the running expenses of the mill. The benefits, he claims, would be that each one would get what his wheat is actually worth and besides that, would have all of the bran to feed to stock, thus enabling the farmers to raise stock of all kinds and diversify his operations. It is a fact that farmers cannot get their grists ground on favorable terms enough to make any difference to them whether they sell their wheat and buy their flour or grind their own wheat, and this is wrong, but just how this system of mills would apply the remedy we fail at first glance to see, as it appears to us wholly impracticable for many reasons. We can see how a few mills constructed on some of the numerous waterpowers on our rivers, if properly managed, would be of great benefit to the farmers because, we are convinced that grain can be ground cheaper that it ever has been in this county, and a few grist-mills in the county, to supply custom work, would not interfere with the merchant mills and would be a vast saving to the farmers on his flour and feed. We should like to see the experiment tried at all events.

Council Proceedings.

COUNCIL CHAMBER, Nov. 20th 1883.

At the regular session of the council on Tuesday evening there were present His Honor, the Mayor, Aldermen Ferguson, Hanscome, Braley and Fortier. The committee on division of Fifth street orders recommended that $200 be placed on general fund. The Recorder was instructed to issue no more orders to assist the band. Petition from F. Morgan to open and run a concert saloon was laid on the table. A draft of the agreement between the city and Chase & Jacobus on electric light business, read and accepted. The constitution and by-laws of the fire company was referred to the proper committee. Bill of M. R. Brown for lumber for a certain crossing was rejected. Adjourned till Wednesday evening, Nov. 21st.

From the Bulletin.

Mr. W. J. Hammond has built a barn 18x32 feet at the back of the house he lives in on Front Street, lately the residence of S. W. Dow.

Steenerson Bros. are having part of their barn altered, so as to turn it into a granary, as they find it pays to be their own shippers of wheat.

The water in the river has never been so low in the memory of the celebrated "oldest inhabitant." This means a fine spring, and consequently a good harvest next year.

On Sunday last Louis Knutson was married to Matilda Torrison at the Lutheran church, the Rev. O. A. Anderson officiating. Louis is well known in these parts, and at present holds a lucrative post at Portland.

The Rev. Mr. Anderson preached in the Lutheran church here last Sabbath for the first time in two months, the church having been closed during construction. Now it is in a shape worthy of being called a house of God.

Mr. Davidson, foreman of the Keystone farm, gave us a call on Monday. He says the had an average of fourteen bushels to the acre, and only 600 out of 80,000 bushels that was at all touched by the frost. All the remainder went No. 1 hard.

OFFICIAL PAPER OF THE COUNTY.

CROOKSTON, THURSDAY, NOV. 22

IT "SQUEEZES" IN MANITOBA.

The Manitoba Free Press copies an item from the Grand Forks Plaindealer and uses it as a text to show how the monopoly is enjoyed over the border. The Free Press says:

A DAKOTA MONOPOLY.

The Grand Forks Plaindealer in a vigorous article shows how the pursuit of agriculture in Dakota is hampered by the monopoly which the Minneapolis Millers' Association have managed to acquire. It says:

"This they have effected by gathering up the great system of elevators they now control, and as it is generally believed, their chicanery with the Manitoba Railroad. As a ruse the farmers of this Northwest come here without sufficient means to purchase their necessary farming implements, and construct necessary buildings on their farms. The result is that for nearly every reaper, plow or other farming utensil purchased, or the material of which their buildings are constructed, a mortgage is given, to be redeemed by October1. The millers know this, hence it is a very profitable policy for them to raise a cry of "frosted wheat," and away down goes the prices to forty and fifty cents, and it must be sold. It requires very little reflection to see the large amount of money the farmers of Dakota are robbed of by this association which ought to be applied to the improvement of their farms—to the necessaries of home comforts, instead of going to increase the riches of those who are sucking the life blood of this country."

Farmers on this side of the border will appreciate the sentiments of our Grand Forks contemporary, and will subscribe to its closing sentences which would apply without any change to the Canadian Northwest as well as the American. "The natural interaction of the great law of supply and demand protected from fraud, undue speculation, and the manipulation of rings, in manufacturers, dealers or carriers, is the only safe basis for the healthy growth and stability of trade especially on these all important products, the bread grains of the world. Give to this Northwest a proper and unrestricted course of transportation and markets will be opened in the face of supples almost exhaustless, increasing with the world's markets creating their demands, and then there will be had that keen and vigorous competition which will displace every species of monopoly and place our grain trade upon a firm and secure basis."

AN OPEN LETTER.

Messrs. Jordan and Tallett, Members of Congress, Cincinnati, Ohio.

BARTLETT, D. T., Nov. 5.—Gentlemen—A great public good can be served if Congress, by appropriate legislation, will pass a law to retain in the government the ownership and the control of all the undisposed pine lands in the State of Minnesota, and with the least possible delay will open them to lumbering operations and all citizens alike at a low stumpage or royalty charge, as has been done in Maine and Canada for years. The stumpage to be sold only as fast as cut, as this method, even at fifty cents royalty, will bring to the treasury more than it has ever realized from a sale of the soil, and will still leave the government the owner of the soil, with its younger pine, and will render it impossible to corner or monopolize the price of lumber, or to place it above the cost of production, plus this royalty and a small dealer's profit, because at any time any citizen can go to this forest and produce lumber and have the same, holding lumber at an extortionate price without a purchaser.

Notwithstanding that Northern Minnesota has a large area of the very finest pine timber, about one-half of which has already passed out of the government, bringing it in most cases only $1.25 an acre under the pre-emption and homestead laws, and in other instances no consideration whatever, other than the extension of script that it was intended by Congress should be laid on prairie lands, and where the mode of proclamation and public sale has been adopted, owing to combination among purchasers these lands have brought on the average not to exceed $3 50 per acre, and still, notwithstanding the cheapness with which these lands have been acquired and the very large extent of them which has already been sold, the better grades of pine lumber retail in Northern Minnesota and Eastern Dakota at $50 and $55 a thousand feet at this time. Located upon Red Lake and Red Lake River, in the State of Minnesota, is quite a large body of some of the very finest pine timber in the United States, that at a cost of about fifty cents a thousand can be driven or floated down in the log to Grand Forks, Dakota, and to intermediate points for manufacture where it can be sawed at an expense of about two dollars and fifty cents per thousand feet, and matched and planed for one dollar and fifty cents a thousand feet, and contiguous to this pine are thousands of farmers and town residents idle during six months of the year, having teams which they would like to utilize with their own labor in getting this pine out, and from the results of their winter's labor procure for their families suitable shelter, and their stock such as is seen in the east, and of which they are now denied. I write to you as an old personal acquaintance and friend, instead of to the Minnesota representatives in either branch of Congress, for two reasons: First, this pine is the property of the general government as much so as though it was so much money laying in the United States treasury, and therefore no courtesy rule of Congress excludes you from introducing any bill into Congress relating to it, and urging the same for adoption.

Secondly—For the reason that it is feared and believed here that the most of the Minnesota delegation in the two houses of Congress, as well as the more influential part of the Minnesota press, are owned and possessed by the pine interests of Minnesota.

This measure will also enable this pine timber to be utilized at once, after such a law shall be enacted sooner than it can be under any law that will first require survey, appraisement, proclamation and sale, in addition to a new treaty after such laws have been passed, before an inch of the pine timber can be utilized for lumbering operations, and it will not require the Indians who inhabit these lands to remove from them, and it will save the government a vast amount of expense in that respect. Permission by law, for any citizen to lumber from the public domain, in any portion of the territories and in the Pacific States, from off any of the mineral lands of the United States, has existed since May, 1878, free of charge, and no valid reason can be found for withholding this privilege from being exercised for pay on the public domain of Minnesota, save that it will spoil the profits now being made by pine land owners from the public. Outside of said pine land investors, I do not believe there is a citizen of either political party in all the prairie regions of the west that would object to this stumpage law, and I hope you will do what you can to introduce and have such a law passed at this coming congress.

These pine men when they get their land, sell the pine on the stumpage plan to the men who saw it up, and thus squeeze the producer as well as the consumer of pine lumber. We prefer to be squeezed by Uncle Sam, and see him get the profits of the process. You have many constituents, who themselves or their children will come to these prairies and take up land, very poor, and who on their arrival should not be compelled to pay a large tribute to these pine men before they can place a shelter over them, and my long acquaintance with each of you makes me confident that you will do all in your power to prevent this. A hundred millions of dollars would not be a large estimate of the actual value of all the Minnesota pine lands yet left, if they can be released by congress and properly controlled for the good of the public, situated as they are on the verge of the largest prairie on the face of the globe.

Yours truly,
W. H. STANDISH.

Norman County Index: The Sterrett, Hill & Child's elevator had a narrow escape from burning Wednesday evening. The fire was discovered in the cupola about 7 o'clock, and it appeared as if the structure must burn. A bucket line was formed as quickly as possible from the bottom to the top of the elevator, and in a short time the fire was extinguished.

A Way of Escape.

Fisher Bulletin.

A subscriber, commenting upon the general and deep feeling that the present depressed state of the market is due to the machinations of the Minneapolis wheat ring, asks the very pertinent questions, "What is the farmer going to do about it?" In a community like this, where differences in language, and great distances between houses, narrows a farmer's acquaintances to comparatively a very few persons, there is a lack of confidence making it exceedingly difficult to suggest a remedy for existing abuses which is not open to one or more fatal objections. Many different propositions have reached our ears, notably, one based upon sound business principles, that the farmers organize a Grain Producers Association, with capital sufficient for the erection of suitable warehouses, and having power to issue negotiable warehouse receipts to be used as collateral for temporary loans, the association to have in the principal markets agents to obtain temporary loans for subscribers, and to sell wheat by sample. But all such propositions depend so entirely upon confidence of each member in the honesty and good judgment of every other member, that we do not believe such scheme practical in the present condition of affairs. We have scarcely begun to get acquainted with our neighbors; besides, too many institutions of similar character have been wrecked upon the rocks of speculation by perfectly honest but inexperienced managers. Another proposition has been made which we regard with especial favor because it requires no expenditure of money, and is based upon successful experience in other states. It is, briefly, the organization of farmers only as a Farmers' Society, having for its chief object the instruction of farmers in the most approved and successful methods of producing grain or raising of stock, and in the methods to be pursued in selling farm products. Under the form of such an organization the farmers can, if at all, work out their own remedy for existing abuses. For instance, by appointing a committee whose duty it shall be to become thoroughly conversant with prices to be obtained at the principal markets, charges for transportation over different routes, and of handling in the elevators and other matters of that class; also to be on the lookout for parties likely to become competitors as buyers of our grain, and give them every reasonable inducement to enter this territory. For example, the English, and, presumably, other foreign millers, are contemplating sending their own agents to America to purchase No. 1 Hard direct of the farmer, that they may place themselves upon the same footing with the Minneapolis and Rochester millers. The farmers' committee should search out and put themselves in correspondance with these millers, and by offering proper encouragement, hasten the day when the foreign market is brought direct to our very doors, and thereby save to our farmers the fees and commissions now being paid to middlemen. Another committee should be appointed upon law and legislation, to secure the passage of a law protecting the farmers from exorbitant and unjust railroad and elevator charges, and establishing better safeguards around an honest inspection and grading of wheat and other grain. Upon the work to be performed by these two committees hinge our hopes of obtaining a correction of the abuses we have complained of. But the society would be of incalculable benefit to our farmers in other respects. It would bring the farmers together socially, and give opportunity for the formation of many pleasant acquaintances. It would make possible combinations for the purchase of farm machinery at prices much lower than can be obtained on single purchases, and be a school for education in approved methods of farming by affording a chance to the successful ones to relate their experience. This subject is too great and too important for the limits of this article, and further elaboration must be reserved to another issue. Our purpose will be gained if the inquiring subscriber sees in the society a satisfactory answer to his question, "How can the farmer protect himself against the wheat ring?"

Frequent complaints are poured into our ear by the farmers that they can get more for their wheat elsewhere than they can here. We have tried to get at the truth in the matter, and in one or two instances we find that our elevator bosses have offered less than was obtained elsewhere; but, in the main, we are sure as good figures are given as can be obtained anywhere else. Of course, friends, it is very hard to get No. 3 for No. 1 Hard, but then, that is not the bosses' fault, but the rascally Millers' Association. These men are simply servants, and have to do what they are told. It is a fearful trouble, since all the farmers this year got down and worked like niggers, and then to be rewarded by such impious, villainous, conduct is enough to make a person swear. Never mind, stick to it don't let your courage go down, and as sure as there is a God in Israel so sure will the farmers—if they will only unite—make short work of the scoundrels.

Farm Notes.

Feeding Pumpkins.

This is the time of the year that pumpkins are largely used on the farm. They are not a fat producing material, but they possess excellent milk producing qualities and are valuable for young stock. Being so cheaply raised it would seem that more attention should be given to their cultivation. It is true they contain seven times as much water as either oats or corn, but they are raised that much cheaper in proportion to the labor required for their cultivation. Planted in a corn field, it requires no labor other than that given to the corn, and coming in season between grass and hay they will be found to be of a good deal of moment to the stock.

The Western Farmers.

The past few years has brought a good deal of prosperity to the western farmers. There is no class of equal average means who live so well as they do. One of these possessing a farm and buildings will gather about him and enjoy more real comfort than could be obtained from the income of $80,000 in our cities. He may live in a more commodious dwelling than a metropolitan citizen having $10,000 annual income. He may have his carriages and horses. His table may be supplied with everything fresh in its season. His labor is less wearing than the toil of counting rooms and offices, and he has more leisure. There can be no reason why he should not be contented with his calling, and he should instil into the mind of each of his boys the necessity of becoming farmers instead of flocking into the cities for the purpose of learning a profession, or for any other purpose. Let him remain on the farm and follow the calling of his father. He will find by doing so that when old age comes on he has missed all the misery of a city life.

More Sheep Wanted.

The West wants more sheep. Minnesota today, has not half the quantity that there should be, nor half the quantity there would have been if there had not been such a multiplicity of miserable, worthless, accursed sheep-killing dogs, whose masters have in the past, had sufficient power to control the Legislature. But dogs and all other enemies of the sheep have not prevented the growing of wool from being a success. The fact is, wool growers do not fail because the growth of the golden fleece and the increase is as perpetual as the sun. It matters not how dark the night is, the wool continues to grow, and it matters not how the wind blows or how it may storm, gestation is never longer than 150 days. The lambs will average one-half females, and often twins, and they breed the next year, making a double compound—a perpetual growth, and no less. Everything that does not go into market goes back to enrich the pastures and though the flock master may be sick it does not stop the growth of the lambs. Not so with other business. The mechanic or the man who works for a salary has nothing to grow while he sleeps; when his labor ceases his income stops, and his expenses are perpetual. It is true there are expenses attending the sheep, but under the most unfavorable circumstances, where they can live in the pastures in summer and in yards and stables in winter on hay and grain or roots, the meat of the wethers will pay a large share of all expenses without drawing to any great extent on the wool or increase of the ewes. Hence it is like a perpetual stream flowing into a basin; it is only a question of time about filling it to overflowing. Dogs or no dogs there is no one branch of industry, either in Minnesota or Dakota, that will pay as well as wool growing.

What an Old Farmer Says.

That to sow foul seed is as bad as to get the itch or the measles, and much worse to get rid of them.

That stock and seed must be renewed or like land without manure they will run out.

That a man must take to the ground that he tills or the ground will take him.

That it is good to make mistakes sometimes, as that will whip you to void them.

That ashes are good on meadows when the season is dry: also on potatoes, roots and other things that require moisture

That it is good to be up early, not only to work, but to see to things, that all is right, fences up, and cattle in their places.

That it is a good thing to have all work done early in the fall, so to be ready for the first foul weather.

That it is a good thing to keep an account of things and know where a person stands.

That it is a very good plan to treat your boys like your boys, and not like strangers. This will keep them at home.

That to abuse a dumb beast on the farm is to abuse a member of the family.

That it is not humbling yourself to go to a neighbor and ask his advice, especially when he surpasses you in his crops. And so you must act in return. Get light whenever you can, and communicate it; that is the doctrine. To be humble like the earth you work—that is a good way of living. It prepares you to go to that earth again when you die.

That money at interest does not pay near as well as it does to send your boys and girls to school for at least four months in each year, untill they are 21 years of age.

An alarum of fire on Tuesday evening called out the department to extinguish the flames in a burning passenger coach on the track. The fire caught from a heating stove in the coach and we are told damaged the coach to the extent of about $500.

Mr. John Lawrence, a farmer, was killed near Ives Station on Saturday last. He was driving along near the track when his horse became frightened by a passing hand-car and ran away throwing Mr. L. from the buggy and killing him. He had a brother in Hennepin Co., who is a doctor.

Mr. D. Z. Horton was in from Maple Lake on Tuesday when we accidentally learned that he had taken unto himself one of Red Lake Falls' fair daughters to wife which circumstance transpired in this city on the 13th inst. The name the lady exchanged for Horton was Rock. The JOURNAL unites with the many friends of the happy pair in best wishes for their future happiness.

At the adjourned council meeting held on Friday evening the fire committee reported favorably upon the adoption of the constitution and by-laws of the Crookston Fire Co., which report was adopted, and a motion to increase the company to twenty members was adopted. The draft of an ordinance to codify, consolidate and amend the general ordinances of the city, was read and adopted.

In conversation with a prominent farmer of Angus, last week to illustrate how much the wheat buyers know about the so-called frozen wheat he told us that he hauled in a load of wheat that had been raised in 1882, and that stood in the stack until this fall, and came out bright and nice. This wheat, the elevator man gravely informed the farmer was "very badly frozen!" This shows that they know nothing about it or else intend to steal it outright.

"Above the Clouds" was presented to crowded houses, by the Crookston Dramatic Society, on Thursday and Friday evenings of last week. It is very seldom that a traveling theatre company, able to beat our Crookston actors, visits this city and this is saying a great deal for we have visits from many old and experienced actors. Each actor seemed suited to his or her part and each did equally well. We trust this fine entertainment will not be the last of its kind we shall be permitted to enjoy this winter.

The hitch in the saw-mill business, we are glad to be able to say is not so much of a hitch as it appeared to be, and we are told that work on the big saw mill has been resumed. The committee appointed to act in the Boom business have been hard at work and have probably reached a solution of the difficulty, though nothing positive has been done nor will be until Mr. Walker's return, but our reporter was given to understand that the matter is in very satisfactory shape and will doubtless be arranged to the entire satisfaction of all parties in interest.

The New Congregational Church Edifice.

The Congregational church building, which for several months has been slowly assuming its present form of beauty is at last pronounced "finished" and will be dedicated on Sabbath day, Dec. 2d with appropriate services conducted by Rev. Dr. Dana, an eloquent minister of St. Paul assisted by Rev. E. S. Williams and Rev. M. W. Montgomery, of Minneapolis. The dedication of this church is no ordinary event in the history of our city and marks an epoch which is truly gratifying to the little band of faithful workers who have for so long a time labored hard to secure the erection of the beautiful building that now stands complete—awaiting the dedicatory services of next Sabbath day. Some years ago, a little band of christians, composing this church who held services in the old school house decided that they would build a more commodious house of worship, to that end a lot was purchased on the corner of Ash and Third Streets. The Rev. Mr. F. Smith, while pastor of the little flock labored indifatigably in the endeavor to build and, aided by the ladies collected enough to get some lumber on the ground, but about that time he resigned and Rev. S. H. Barteau was assigned to this field. Although faithful in the discharge of his duties he was unable, in the condition in which the members of his church were situated finansially, to see his ardent wish accomplished. He was doing as well as mortal man could do, having gathered together a large and growing congregation, and having by the aid of his gentle and accomplished wife, built up the largest and must thrifty Sunday School in the city, and without doubt in the whole Northwest, when at this juncture dissensions arose which resulted in the resignation of the pastor and the appointment of Rev. T. J. West who officiated but a short time when he was succeeded by Rev. G. E. Page, the present pastor. Mr. Page took right hold of the church building business in the start and has worked early and late until he now sees completed, the finest church and parsonage in the city. The church was built by Mr. Geo. Bishop, of Minneapolis, and with the parsonage we should judge is worth from $10,000 to $12,000. The church has a seating capacity of about 350, is furnished with elegant oak pews, carpeted floors, and stained glass windows. To the ladies belongs the credit of having furnished the church and right well may they feel a pride in what they have done. The church has been built by subscriptions, mostly obtained in this city among which are many from young gentlemen who are working on salaries. There yet remains a small balance which it is hoped will be liquidated before the dedication so that the church may begin its labors in the new edifice free from debt.

Postponement of the Red River Valley and N. P. Sunday School Convention. Owing to the impossibility of some of our eastern friends, whom we had expected coming out to attend our Sunday-school Convention just at this time, and to one or two other reasons not before considered, the Committee have deemed it wise to postpone the meeting (announced for December 11th and 12,) probably until February 1884.

That is what any one will receive who subscribes for The Independent, of New York.

It occupies two fields. First, as a religious journal it is undenominational and broader than any sect. Its aim is to strengthen and extend Evangelical religion and to defend it against the attacks of Materialism, Atheism and unbelief. It is free to approve or criticise in any of the denominations whatever it believes is designed to advance or hinder the progress of the Gospel of Christ.

Amongst its religious writers are Leonard W. Bacon, D. D., S. C. Bartlett, D. D., Prest. John Bascom, Bishop Thos. M. Clark, Rev. Jos. Cook, Bishop A. C. Coxe, Geo. R. Crooks, D. D., Howard Crosby, D. D., Theo. L. Cuyler, D. D., Rev. Samuel Dyke, Geo. P. Fisher, D. D., Prof. Norman Fox, Washington Gladden, D. D., Bishop F. D. Huntington, Bishop J. F. Hurst, E. D. Morris, D. D., Prest. Noah Porter, Francis L. Patton, D. D., Philip Schaff, D. D., R. S. Storrs, D. D., Wm. M. Taylor, D. D., Wm. C. Wilkinson, D. D., Prest. T. C. Woolsey.

Second. As a literary journal it stands without a peer among the weekly press. During the past year it has published articles and poems by more than three hundred of the most talented writers in this country and Europe.

Among them Amelia A. Barr, Mary Clemmer, Rose Terry Cooke, Kate Foote, Dora Read Goodale, Rev. W. E. Griffis, "Grace Greenwood," Thomas Hill, D. D., William D. Howells, "H. H.," Sidney Lanier, Rose Hawthorne Lathrop, Louise Chandler Moulton, Joaquin Miller, E. A. Oakes, Mrs. S. M. B. Piatt, Josephine Pollard, Richard Henry Stoddard, Edmund Clarence Stedman, Mrs. Launt Thompson, J. T. Trowbridge, Celia Thaxter, John Greenleaf Whittier, Sarah C. Woolsey, Susan E. Wallace, Wm. C. Ward and Prof. Charles A. Young.

The Independent will, within the next few months, publish stories by Wm. D. Howells, author of "Their Wedding Journey," "A Modern Instance," etc.; W. E. Norris, author of "Matrimony," "No New Thing," etc.; F. Marion Crawford, author of "Mr. Isaacs," "Dr. Claudius," etc.; J. S., of Dale, author of "Guerndale," Edward Everett Hale, author of "Ten Times One is Ten," etc.; Julia Schayer, author of "Tiger and Lily, and Other Stories," Rebecca Harding Davis, Sarah Orne Jewett, Fred D. Story, Kate Upton Clarke, etc. etc. It is also negotiating with other distinguished story-writers of England and America, whose names it does not as yet feel at liberty to make public.

In civil and political affairs The Independent contends for sound ideas and principles. It believes in the reform of the civil service and tariff, in the purification of politics, and maintains those principles which the highest ethics and best intelligence requires.

The Independent has 22 distinct departments 32 pages in all.

THE SUN.

NEW YORK, 1884.

About sixty million copies of THE SUN have gone out of our establishment during the past twelve months.

If you were to paste end to end all the columns of all THE SUNS printed and sold last year you would get a continuous strip of interesting information, common sense, wisdom, sound doctrine and sane wit long enough to reach from Printing House Square to the top of Mount Copernicus in the moon, then back to Printing House square, and then three-quarters of the way back to the moon again.

But The Sun is written for the inhabitants of the earth; this same strip of intelligence would girdle the globe twenty-seven or twenty-eight times.

If every buyer of a copy of The Sun during the past year has spent only one hour over it, and if his wife or his grandfather has spent another hour, this newspaper in 1883 has afforded the human race thirteen thousand years of steady reading, night and day.

It is only by little calculations like these that you can form any idea of the most popular of American newspapers, or of its influence on the opinions and actions of American men and women.

The Sun is, and will continue to be, a newspaper which tells the truth without fear of consequences, which gets at the facts no matter how much the process costs, which presents the news of all the world without waste of words and in the most readable shape, which is working with all its heart for the cause of honest government, and which therefore believes that the Republican party must go, and must go in this coming year of our Lord, 1884.

If you know The Sun, you like it already, and you will read it with accustomed diligence and profit during what is sure to be the most interesting year in its history. If you do not yet know The Sun, it is high time to get into the sunshine.

TERMS TO MAIL SUBSCRIBERS.

The several editions of The Sun are sent by mail, postpaid, as follows:

DAILY—50 cents a month, $6 a year: with Sunday edition, $7.

SUNDAY—Eight pages. This edition furnishes the current news of the world, special articles of exceptional interest to everybody, and literary reviews of new books of the highest merit. $1 a year.

WEEKLY—$1 a year. Eight pages of the best matter of the daily issues; An Agricultural Department of unequalled value, special market reports, and literary, scientific and domestic intelligence make The Weekly Sun the newspaper for the farmer's household. To clubs of ten with $10, an extra copy free.

"What sort of a gift will I take?"
Asks my saucy debtor.
"Shall she make or buy the thing.
Which do I like the better?"

Then to mine a little hand
Is yielded up completely,
While her red lips try to pout,
And the eyes smile sweetly.

"Know'st thou prisoner at the bar,
(Still I hold her tightly),
The meaning of that Grecian word?"
"No," she answers, lightly.

"Pena—penalty; philo—love,
According to the letter,
And if you cannot pay the debt
I must keep the debtor.

MIRIAM.

"Before decay's effacing fingers
Have swept the lines where beauty lingers."

Beneath the lofty cliffs which frowne above the "silver streak" there is a sheltered spot called Madeira, which is much affected by those who love the gentle glow of the winter sun.

It was there, upon a certain morning, that Herbert Trevannion found himself in a bath-chair. A fall from his horse and a broken limb had brought him to Brighton. He was horribly bored of course, and had he had a sympathizing friend, he would have expressed himself thus:

"What in the world am I to do with myself in this abandoned place? There is not a house open to me; not a soul to speak to, not even a woman to love—at least, not a good-looking one. And to think that it will be at least a month before I can cross a horse! It is maddening."

In despair he produced a paper—the Daily Telegraph—and abandoned himself to the charms of its sparkling columns.

He was in the midst of a letter from a suburban butterman lamenting the difficulty of providing, in these hard times, with a due regard to their position in society, for eleven sons lawfully begotten, when the sound of wheels disturbed him. It was only a bath-chair passing. An ordinary occurrence enough. But in this chair was a woman with a face which seemed to interest him, for he followed it with his eye steadily till it passed away up the cliff out of sight. Then he exclaimed:

"What a perfect beauty! She is the very image of that Greuze at home. Who can she be?"

Perhaps he obtained an introduction to the "image of the Greuze" through the French chairman, or more likely, presented himself sans ceremonie; at all events, he is standing a mont afterward by her side. He is quite well now and able to hunt, and in fact, is hunting, but not the fox. "For beauty lures the full-grown child" as effectually as the red vermin of the woods, and as often as not leads him "a chase of idle hopes and fears," to finish up, alas! with tears.

That the quarry is hard pressed is evident, for her face is unusually pale, and her voice trembles as she murmurs in reply to an appeal of her companion, "It can not, can not be!"

"But if you will not marry me, what will you do?"

"Go home and try to forget you."

"You dare not go home, for you can not forget me."

The "image" turned her face toward the sea, and was silent for a while. Then said, "What you tell me is, alas, too true; I can not forget you."

"Then marry me Mariam!"

"I can not marry you," she repeated.

"Tell me are you engaged to be married?"

"I am not."

"What, then, is the meaning of it all?"

"Never mind what it means; enough that I love you too much to leave you."

"Place, then, your hand in mine," said the hunter, "and I will lead you far away beyond the sea, to where we shall be to one another all in all."

Again there was a silence. Then said the woman, "Close your eyes for a moment, Herbert, and promise me on your honor that you will never seek to learn who I am and whence I came, nor to speak to me again of marriage."

"I promise."

Then she drew from her left hand a glove, and cast something with a sigh into the sea.

"Now open your eyes," she said, "and here is my hand, and with it is my heart. Let the dead past bury its dead. I will go away with you whenever and wheresoever you please."

"In one unclouded blaze of living light" the sun is sinking behind the ragged outline of Les Iles Sanguinaries. From the bosom of a cobalt sea the purple peaks of Tardina project themselves far into the pale transparent ether, whilst broken shafts of silvery moonlight gleam through the chestnut trees upon the desolate house where, two years before, Trevannion had brought the fair captive of his bow. They are on the terrace, watching the dying day. Silently and sadly, hand in hand, they note the shadows of the "isles of blood" creep along the sea. Presently one speaks—it is Miriam.

"I have been happy, very happy, here with you, my well-beloved, and the thoughts of parting is bitter pain; but my days now, I know, are numbered."

Trevannion leant over the couch on which she was lying, and looked steadily into her face. There was a change he perceived, even since the morning. He had known for many a day that she was too fragile to live. He saw that the shadow of death was indeed upon her. But he answered never a word.

"You have always been so good and kind to me," she continued, "that I know you will not refuse me another favor, the last I shall ask of you."

"What is it that you would have me do for you, Miriam?"

"I would have you by and by—when I am gone—take me away from here, and lay me away in the old churchyard on the cliff at home; and I would like you to beg the rector of the place to read the service of the church over me. The rector, you understand, not the curate."

He kissed her brow, and said, "You have never told me, darling, where your home is."

"I know. But when it is all over you will learn that from my papers, and the name of the rector as well."

"Shall I take you here now? Perhaps you would like to see this clergyman?"

She did not reply, only shivered. The air of the Mediterranean at sunset sometimes strikes cold. "I think I will go in now, Herbert," she said, presently; "I feel a little tired."

That night she grew worse. In a week the wanderer was at rest.

To Rev. Josiah Smithers, Old Haven. R——J. ——Club. London, July.

Dear Sir—Shortly before the death of my wife, which took place last month in the Island of Corsica, she expressed a wish to me that her remains should be removed to England and interred in the churchyard of the parish of Old Haven, the rector of which I believe you to be.

Furthermore she particularly desired that the funeral service should be performed by no other clergyman than yourself.

I am advised now that the casket is in the custom house of Old Haven awaiting clearance.

As I presume you will not be indisposed to conduct the burial arrangements of one who was formerly your parishioner, I am writing to the custom house authorities to forward the coffin to your mortuary depot.

I shall leave town myself by the night train to-morrow, and propose waiting upon you the following afternoon.

Yours faithfully, HERBERT TREVANNION.

"Is Mr. Smithers at home?" asked Trevannion of the butler at the rectory, soon after his arrival at Old Haven.

"Mr. Smithers is at home, sir, but er—unable to see anybody," was the answer.

"My business is urgent," said Trevannion.

"If you will please to come into the drawing-room, sir, I will speak to Mr. Jones."

He sat himself down and waited. Presently a clergyman entered, evidently the curate.

"I am here," said Trevannion, to him "on a matter connected with a funeral—the burial, in short, of my late wife."

"Yes, I know," said the other; "you are Mr. Trevannion, and have written to Mr. Smithers on the subject?"

"Just so."

"Well, I regret to have to tell you of the sad death of my dear and esteemed friend. Mr. Smithers, alas, is no more. He expired suddenly last night."

"I am inexpressibly shocked," said Trevannion, "to hear this."

"It is, indeed, a great blow to all of us."

"Is there anything in the circumstances of this case extraordinary?"

"Oh, no. It seems that, in consequence of your instructions, he visited the Custom House yesterday. He was apparently quite well when he started. In two hours, he was brought home, alive, it is true; but in an unconscious state. I understood that, in order to satisfy the authorities, it was necessary to examine the coffin. Whilst the operation was proceeding he appears to have fainted, and accordingly was placed in his carriage and sent home at once. He never spoke afterward. There will be an inquest, of course. But, no doubt, it is just a case of heart complaint."

"Yes, I should think so. Has Mr. Smithers, may I ask, left a widow?"

"Well, no. And yet it is not absolutely certain that he has not. The fact is, my poor friend was bereaved of his wife some time ago; not, however, by death, but disappearance. It is a most inexplicable story."

"You will not think me inquisitive if I beg you to tell it to me," said Trevannion.

"O, certainly not. Mrs. Smithers was a lady of great beauty, apparently attached to her husband, and devoted to the duties of her position. On the advice of her doctor she went to the sea side for a change—let me see—yes, just two years ago—and never returned. I she is dead, there is no proof of her death; if alive, she has given no sign of life. It is indeed a great mystery."

"Is there any picture of her here?"

"There is one on the writing table behind you."

Trevannion rose and approached the table. Upon it was a photograph of Miriam.

My Wish-bone.

I had got the "wish-bone"! It was Thanksgiving Day at grandfather's old place in New Hampshire, twenty-three years ago last November, and I a little lad six years old. What a grand day that was! Why, a vision of the double table, with the great, well-browned turkey and the plum pudding, so big it had to be brought on in a milk-pan, came back as freshly, more freshly, than the doings of last week. What eyes we have for good things when six years old! And what appetites, too, for that matter!

No doubt grandfather had slyly slipped the wish-bone into my plate; but I thought my finding it a piece of the purest good luck, and I was proud of it as a caliph of his conquests.

My faith in those days was strong in wish-bones. I picked that one clean, and as soon as dinner was over I wanted to wish. First one, then another of my cousins—Hiram, Frank, Emma—were challenged to take one side of the bone, and wish with me. But they, older, all declined. "It's too green," they said. "Hang it up over the fireplace till next week."

But I had my "wish"—the thing I most wanted—in my mind, and I was not willing to be put off. So I still went round the table, teasing one and another to wish with me, till I was ready to cry with vexation, while the others laughed at me.

But my Aunt Theodora—how well I remember my fair-faced, blue-eyed Aunt Dora!—beckoned me to come to her. "I will wish with you, my Eddy," she said.

We wished—then tugged and twisted at the tough bone she laughing, I very much in earnest. I was the fortunate one, and I got the wish, that is, the larger piece of the wish-bone. I had wished for a sled, and I got it two days after.

Aunt Theodora did not then tell me her wish! but I still recollect seeing her writing something with her pencil on a slip of paper, and then she wrapped the two broken bits of bone up in it.

Nineteen years passed. I was in Brownsville, Texas. It was the year 1877. Of myself I may say that I had not prospered thus far in life, though I had been engaged in various schemes for money-getting. My associates there were bad, and I am sorry to say I was much like them. Step by step I had gradually fallen into debasing habits, and had become a companion of sharpers and adventurers.

One day toward the last of November that year, a letter came to my address. I had forgotten the hand-writing. The letter seemed to have something hard and clumsy in it.

I felt it curiously with my fingers, then broke it open. Inside was a piece of white paper, yellowed with age, wrapped round two withered bits of bone. Pencilled on the paper were the long ago written words:

"I wish that Eddy may grow up an honest man and a true Christian gentleman."

Beneath was written more recently, "This was my wish, Eddy,—the one I didn't tell you,—when we wished together years and years ago. May I still hope that it will come true?"

A curious sensation of strange, long forgotten things struggled within me at sight of this relic of my younger, purer years. Yes, there was the old wish-bone. Again I saw the Thanksgiving table and the circle of dear old home folks, amid them the thoughtful face and kind blue eyes of Aunt Theodora.

I will not say that I was stricken with strange or violent remorse. But somehow I was able, at that moment, to see clearly what I was and what I ought to be; and before I got up from my chair I made a resolve.

Three days later I left Brownsville and came home to New England. My first step was then to choose a useful, honest business; one in which I felt it possible to live honorable before men. And that I have done. I am now trying to live an industrious, upright, honorable life. That old wish-bone and my aunt's gentle, prayerful interest and love were the means, under God, of saving me from a life of vice and shame.

Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll's middle name is Green.

English Hangmen.

This curious eagerness to be appointed "the law's finisher" becomes the more unintelligible when we consider the hangman's horrible antecedents, and the baleful brutal traditions which surround his office. The predecessors of Tom Cheshire, Calcraft, and Marwood have been through many generations vile, despicable wretches, felon in esse or in posse, thieves and murderers who had barely escaped the gallows, who retained always an intimacy and fellow-feeling with criminals, and not seldom relapsed into crime. For example, one Price, the hangman early last century, was, while actually in office, convicted of murder, and travelled to Tyburn on his own account in the fatal cart. Another, Dennis, in 1870, having been one of the ringleaders in the Lord George Gordon riots, accepted pardon in order to execute his former associates. Again the hangman's functions under our old and ruthless penal code were those of a human butcher. The gallows were like the shambles, where hecatombs suffered. The executioner not only slew, at times he dismembered. He performed nameless barbarities, often with refined and sickening cruelty on condemned traitors; carried their quarters and their decapitated heads back to prison in a basket to be boiled previous to exposure on Temple Bar. It was inevitable that any man who discharged such loathsome duties should degenerate into a callous, cold-blooded ruffian, and the latest practitioners cannot possibly have escaped deterioration. An executioner constantly and exclusively engaged in the taking of human life must by the very nature of his vocations become brutalized. This is established beyond doubt. It is idle to talk of Calcraft as a mild-mannered man, latterly of venerable appearance, and a devoted follower of Isaak Walton, fond of flowers, estimable in his domestic relations. The fact is he was a saturnine and truculent being. As for Marwood, his deterioration was marked and comparatively rapid. The rumor runs that when he first sought, quite uninvited and of his own free will, the employment with which his name has since been so intimately associated, he was a man who lived in the odor of sanctity, was not without repute as a local preacher, and was generally a reputable member of society. The rule of nil nisi bonum may perhaps be invoked to shield even a hangman's memory, and it will be enough to hint that he was not an irreproachable person toward the close of his career. It may be stated, too, to his discredit, that he latterly permitted himself to add ridicule and contumely to his ghastly functions. The fact that he could make money by their rehearsal, as happened not long ago at a certain cathedral town, where he performed the process of pinioning the curious at a shilling a head, proves that he must have grown singularly depraved in his latter days. That such an exhibition was possible is the best argument for an entire revision of our method of giving effect to capital punishment.—Major Griffiths in the Fortnightly Review.

Instantly Relieved.

Mrs. Ann Lacour of New Orleans, La., writes:—I have a son who has been sick for two or three years; he has been attended by our leading physicians but all to no purpose. This morning he had his usual spell of coughing, and was so greatly prostrated in consequence, that death seemed imminent. We had in the house a bottle of Dr. Wm. Hall's Balsam for the Lungs, purchased by my husband, who noticed your advertisement yesterday. We administered it according to directions and he was instantly relieved.

CONSUMPTION.

Dr. Meredith, Dentist, of Cincinnati, was thought to be in the last stages of Consumption, and was induced by his friends to try Allen's Lung Balsam after the formula was shown him. We have his letter that it at once cured his cough and that he was able to resume his practice.

Jeremiah Wright, of Marion County, W. Va., writes us that his wife had Pulmonary Consumption and was pronounced incurable by their physician, when the use of Allen's Lung Balsam entirely cured her. He writes that he and his neighbors think it the best medicine in the world.

Wm. C. Digges, Merchant, of Bowling Green, Va., writes April 4, 1881, that he wants us to know that the Lung Balsam has cured his mother of Consumption, after the physician had given her up as incurable. He says others knowing her case have taken the Balsam and been cured. He thinks all so afflicted should give it a trial.

Wm. A. Graham & Co., Wholesale Druggists Zanesville, Ohio, write us of the cure of Matthias Freeman, a well-known citizen, who had been afflicted with Bronchitis in its worst form for twelve years. The Lung Balsam cured him as it has cured many others of Bronchitis.

FOR LADIES.
I have been using for a month or two in my household, Swift's Specific (S. S. S.), the greater portion of it having been consumed by the female portion of my family, and with the happiest results. It acted like a charm on my wife, who had been in bad health for a long time, and for whom I had paid hundreds of dollars for doctors and medicines. It began to build her up from the first dose. Another female member of my family took it with equally satisfactory results. It is certainly the best tonic for delicate ladies that I have ever used, and I have tried them all. I have no doubt that want of exercise, close confinement in poorly ventilated houses, sewer gas poison and malarial poison often produce sickness among our wives, daughters and sisters, and I believe Swift's Specific is the remedy for all this sort of blood poisoning.

ENGLISH RAILWAYS.

Description of the Principal Lines and Their Characteristics.

Taking into consideration the immense railroad interests of America, and that so many Englishmen (both prominent and obscure) have been lately, and are at present, on the far side of the Atlantic investigating the American railway system, and getting free rides from one end of the country to the other, it has seemed to me in this annual interregnum of dullness through which London is now passing that I could not do better than devote a few remarks to the roads of England.

In the first place, let me state that in England is almost invariably called a railway. The chief English "lines"—as roads are always called—are those which enter and depart from London. The principal companies, therefore, are the Great Northern; Great Eastern; Great Western; London and Northwestern; London and Southwestern; Southeastern; Midland; London, Brighton, and South-Coast; and London, Chathans, and Dover. All of these companies have termini in London, some of them possessing two or three; in different parts of the metropolis, and these connecting with other lines. These termini are each called and known by some distinctive name, arising in many instances, from the locality in which they are situated. The chief railway termini in London are: "Kings Cross," for the Great Northern; "Liverpool Street," for the Great Eastern; "Paddington," for the Great Western; "Eastern Square," for the London and Northwestern; "Waterloo," for the London and Southwestern; "Charing Cross," for the Southeastern; "St. Pancras," for the Midland; "Victoria," for the London, Chatham, and Dover; and "London Bridge," for the London, Brighton, and South Coast. "Cannon Street," also belongs to the Southeastern company, it being the company's chief point of arrival in and departure from the city.

All of these termini are called stations—thus: "Victoria Station," "Waterloo Station," etc.—though more frequently the word "station" is dropped altogether when they are spoken of or referred to, and they are simply called "Waterloo," "Victoria," "Paddington," or "Euston" ("Square" being also commonly ommitted). In taking a ticket at a country town or station for London, a ticket for London is never asked for. The terminal station of the line in London is the point always mentioned. The formula of taking a ticket, or "booking," as our phrase is, is very simple and economical of time, thus, "One first, single Paddington," means that you want one ticket by the first-class for the single journey (not return) to Paddington Station, in London. Should you wish a return ticket, you say, "return," instead of single." Stations are never called "depots," though the name of "depot" is now not infrequently applied to the goods (freight) and luggage depositories belonging to the different lines.

The longest line is the Great Western, it having over two thousand miles of "way" constructed and in work. The London and Northwestern, Northeastern, and the Midland come next with lines of from one to two thousand miles in length. Of the London lines, the London, Chatham, and Dover is the shortest, being only one hundred and thirty-four miles long. The Caledonian, of Scotland, has nearly nine hundred miles in work, but I am speaking particularly of English lines. The London and Northwestern was the most expensive to build, though it is some four hundred miles shorter than the Great Western. It cost upward of ninety-one millions of pounds, against sixty-four millions for the Great Western. The Midland cost sixty-six millions, and the Chatham and Dover, the shortest of all the lines, twenty-three millions.

A train is never called "the cars," but "the train," simply. The vehicles for passengers are called "carriages" and consist of first, second, and third-classes. Each carriage has from four to five compartments, separated from each other by partitions which divide the carriage crosswise, with a door and two windows at each end for each compartment, a third window being set in the upper part of the door, much after the fashion of the old stage coaches, from which I believe they were originally patterned. The first-class compartments have six seats, three on each side facing each other. The seats are comfortably cushioned and are divided by arms. In night trains these arms are arranged to move back on hinges, and so permit of the seats making a continuous sofa or couch for the passenger to lie upon. The second-class compartments are less comfortably cushioned than the first, the third class having generally only wooden seats, and frequently only half partitions between the compartments. In neither second nor third class compartments are the seats separated by arms. Sometimes the compartments of a carriage are all of one class; sometimes they are of different classes. In the latter case they are called composite carriages. One or more compartments of each class in a train are set aside for smoking, the words "Smoking Comp't" or "Smoking" being painted on the windows or doors of permanent smoking compartments, or placarded on the window of a compartment temporarily assigned for the purpose. The words, "First," "Second," or "Third," are painted on the doors of the respective compartments. Each compartment is lighted at night from the ceiling. Lamps with glass shades resembling "bull's-eye," are inserted and fastened through apertures in the roof. There is a cloth shade, adjusted by a spring, to cover this light, should the passenger wish to sleep. In cold weather, the first and second-class compartments are provided with foot-warmers, the same being flat zinc or tin tubes filled with hot water, and placed on the floors of the compartments.

Compared with the luxury of a Pullman car, all this must seem very comfortless. But it should be remembered that all distances in England are so short that two consecutive nights in a train (following on return journeys, of course, excepted) are an impossibility. For one night, therefore, the average English traveler is amply content with a first-class compartment to himself, which he can always get by giving the guard half a crown. The Midland and the Brighton and South Coast lines each run "Pullman cars—the former "sleeping," the latter "drawing-room" cars. But with the exception of that obtained from Americans traveling to and from Liverpool by the midnight trains, for whose convenience the company undoubtedly runs them, I don't think the former get any patronage to speak of. As for the drawing-room cars on the Brighton line, they seem superfluous, for that company is proverbial for the fineness and luxurious upholstery of its first-class carriages. It is my impression, on the whole, that—whatever he may be doing elsewhere—Mr. Pullman is not making his fortune in England.

The carriages are not set on trucks, as are the cars in America, but run on iron spoked wheels, the ends of the axles of which turn in sockets on each side of the carriages. Locomotives are always called engines, the engineers drivers, and the firemen, stokers. The English railway engine is very different in appearance from the American locomotive. It looks much more bulky and unwieldy, is generally painted black or dark green and displays little, if any, polished brass-work outside, the cylinders and pistons being usually concealed from the view. It has no bell, headlight, cow-catcher, or cab, the only semblance to the latter being a sort of stationary shield with round holes to look through, and the whistle is not a hoarse staccato "toot," but a shrill high-pitched scream.

The engines are all "coal-burners," and the chimneys are low and perpendicular to the tops. Engines are provided with two forward buffers, such as the carriages have at each end of which is affixed at night a different colored lamp. Baggage is called luggage, and the car in which it is carried is called the van. Luggage is never checked, as in America (to our discredit be it spoken), but labeled, a small printed label bearing the name of the place or London station, which may be the destination of the passenger, being pasted on his trunk or portmanteau. On some lines a semblance to the American checking system is followed; the label put on the luggage bears a number, and a duplicate label is given to the owner. This plan is adopted on the Brighton and South Coast line, and on the "tidal" trains for Paris of the Southeastern and Southwestern companies.

Tickets are collected at the gateways of stations as the passengers go out, or the train is stopped a short distance from the terminal station, and the different compartments visited by officials for the purpose. Conductors are called guards. They wear a dark blue uniform with the button of the company employing them, and start the trains by blowing a small whistle like an American policeman's. Each terminus and station is supplied with porters, varying in number according to the size and importance of the place. They are dressed in a uniform of dark brown corduroy with a numbered badge round the arm, and convey passengers luggage to and from the train, affix the labels, etc.; and, though it is forbidden by the rules of the company, expect, and almost invariably receive, a small gratuity for their services. Preliminary warning of a train's starting is the ringing of a large hand-bell. "Take your seats!" is also generally called at the larger station where a stay has been made. "All aboard!" is an expression never used. The ringing of the hand-bell also announces the approach of a train at a station. The "block" system, in vogue on most if not all of the lines, prevents the departure of a train from a station until the signals show that the train preceding it has left the next station, and that therefore the line between the stations is clear. The ringing of an electric bell is the signal. At all stations, where there is shunting to be done, there is a signal-house, a square, wooden building raised on posts above the line, the front and sides of which are open, a good deal like the judge's stand on a race-course, or the pilot-house of a Mississippi steamboat, only, of course on a larger scale. All the changing of points by which shunting (switching) is done is controlled here by a system of wires, pulleys, and levers.

The track is called the line; ties are called sleepers; switches, points; and to take a ticket is to book; a freight train is called a goods train; and all trains going to London no matter from what point, are up trains. All railway lines enter and depart from London on a roadway of their own, seperated from and built above the streets on continuous archways of masonary, which bridge the streets or suburban roads the line may intersect, and it does not follow the course of any street or road as such. In the larger cities and towns the rule is the same. Then the line gets beyond the suburbs and into the open country, there are three ways in which roads are crossed or intersected by it—viz, by a bridge over the road, by a passage under the road (a bridge for the road crossing the line), or by a crossing on the road's level. In the latter case, gates at each side of the line are kept in charge of a servant of the company, and are closed during the near approach and passage of a train. "Look out for the locomotive when the bell rings," is a notice never seen or required in England. At the larger and more important stations, and at all the termini, passengers are not allowed to cross the line at any time, except by a bridge over the line, or by a tunnel under it, with which means of transit the stations are provided.

The average speed of ordinary passenger trains is thirty five miles an hour. Of course, express trains run faster than that—viz., from forty-five to sixty miles. The fastest three trains are those known as the "Flying Dutchman," the "Flying Scotchman," and the "Wild Irishman." The "Flying Dutchman" runs on the Great Western from Paddington to Exeter, a distance of a hundred and ninety-four miles, in four hours and a quarter, making four stops only; the "Flying Scotchman" runs on the Great Northern line, from King's Cross to Edinburgh a distance of three hundred and ninety-five miles, in exactly nine hours; and the "Wild Irishman" runs on the Northwestern line, from Euston to Holyhead, a distance of two hundred and seventy miles, in six hours and forty minutes. This train leaves Euston station every night at twenty-five minutes past eight o'clock, and carries the Irish mail; carrying, also, on the nights of days on which the mail steamers leave Liverpool, the American mail, which is transported via Holyhead, Kingstown, Dublin, and Cork, to Queenstown, and there catches the steamers, having left London several hours after they had sailed from Liverpool. The "Wild Irishman" stops at but one station—Chester—during the entire journey. There may be other train which may be claimed to be faster, and which now and then make their appearance on the different railway time-tables of Great Britain, but the three I have mentioned are standard and established expresses, and well known as such.

The nobility, I may mention, are considerably interested in railways, and the boards of directors of the different companies throughout the kingdom include several noble names.

The seven Sutherland sisters, now living in St. Louis, have reason to be proud of their hair. Their capillary attractions are described as follows: Sarah N. Sutherland, the eldest, has long, massive and jet black hair, falling below her waist; Miss Victoria, whose hair is the longest worn by any woman in the world, shows a growth reaching to a length of seven and a half feet; Miss Isabella's hair is more than six feet long; Miss Grace's reaches a length of almost six feet; Miss Naomi's hair, which almost touches the ground when she stands erect, is the most massive and beautiful ever seen upon a woman's head; it is fully six inches through, and when spread out covers her completely like a cloak. Miss Dora's hair is abundant and five feet long. Miss Mary is the youngest, her hair has already attained a wonderful growth, and is rapidly tending toward such length and massiveness as will make it the most wonderful capillary decoration the world ever saw.

Personal Gossip.

Mrs. Mary A. Livermore is now past 60 years of age, but does not look older than 45. She travels 25,000 miles a year. Her home is at Melrose, near Boston. Just across the street lives her only married daughter, whose husband is the principal of an important Boston school.

Castleton, Vt., boasts of a minister who has preached for fifty years at a salary running from $250 to $1,000. Forty years ago he was getting $300, had a wife and four children and lived in a house without a carpet or stove. Now he has retired, has 250 yards of carpeting and four stoves, and five sons scattered through the country and doing well. This shows that by combining piety with industry a man may attain affluence even in Vermont if he lives long enough.

It is rumored that the eldest daughter (Amelie) of the Count de Paris is to be married to the Grand Duke Alexis of Russia. Alexis is the younger brother of the Czar, and he visited the United States during President Grant's administration. The Count de Paris intends to be King of France—if he can get the crown. This marriage is arranged with reference to an alliance between France and Russia.

Gen. Sheridan never wants a carriage for himself. He never uses one in Washington if he can avoid it. If the day is fine he walks; if not he rides in a street car. When his war horse Winchester, died, a few years ago, says the Washington Post, his love for horse flesh went out of him. A gentleman who knew him well in boyhood says that the first time Sheridan ever bestrode a horse was when another boy put him on a fiery colt, unsaddled and unbridled, and told him to hold on by his knees. The animal galloped across the country for several miles and then came to a halt, and Sheridan was still holding on.

Sir Moses Montefiore sustains nature entirely on milk and old port wine, of which he drinks two or three glasses every day, varied with sour and a little bread and butter sometimes. In middle life he smoked, but he has given up tobacco for many years. He rises at 11 o'clock, having had his letters read to him in bed, then drives out for several hours, and retires at 9. He has a likeness of Mr. Gladstone, of whom he is fond, over his bed. He wears a blue coat, frilled shirt, and goes about in the old-fashioned sedan chair.

Boniface De Roo, a native of Holland, who had lived for the last seven een years in Akron, O., where he died November 3, bequeathed $10,000 to that city, his entire fortune. When he was eighteen years old a severe illness practically destroyed one of his lungs, but by uncommon prudence and care he prolonged his life to seventy-two years. He visited many states and countries in search of the climate most favorable to his infirmities, and, thinking that he knew more about his own condition than any one else, entertained a poor opinion of doctors. Brought up near the field of Waterloo, De Roo as a boy saw the troops of cavalry riding to the battle, and remembered holding the horse of a French officer who had occasion to dismount on his way to the conflict.

Lucy E. Maclean, formerly a literary woman of some distinction at Olean, N. Y., was seen begging in New York City, the other day. She was a singular and unhappy woman, and her actions caused much comment. A predominant characteristic was her mania for bustles. She wore a dark calico dress of ancient style, Summer and Winter. She was a daughter of Captain Mclean, who served in the Revolutionary War, and when young she was a great belle, pretty, talented and gay, and her admirers were many. She wrote articles of considerable merit which found their way into the magazines and newspapers of the day. She also had a large number of correspondents, among them Longfellow and Salmon P. Chase. She at length became insane and has roamed about aimlessly for twenty years.

Trimming an Elephant's Feet.

Recently Prof. George Arstingstall and four assistants were occupied all day in trimming the feet of two of Barnum's elephants. The operation is performed three times a year—once on the road, once in the fall, and again in the spring. The sole of an elephant's foot is heavily covered with a thick horny substance of material similar to the three toenails upon each foot, and as it grows thicker and thicker it tends to contract and crack, often laming the animal. When the work of trimming is undertaken, the elephant stands upon three legs and places the foot to be operated upon across a big tub. Two men hold the leg down and one stands at the animal's head to prevent him from turning. Then Professor Arstingstall, with a two-foot drawing knife, proceeds to shave off great pieces of bone from the sole of the foot. Shavings of bone six inches by four and a quarter of an inch thick are rapidly cut, the edges of the foot being carefully trimmed. Often pieces of glass, wire, nails etc., are found imbedded in the foot, which have been picked up during street parades. Sometimes these irritating morsels work up into the leg and produce a festering sore. A large nail was found yesterday in Pallas's foot imbedded over three inches from the bottom. Professor Arstingstall extracted it with a small pair of pincers, then syringed the wound with warm water, and subsequently covered it with tar. The professor then hurried on the road, sometimes draws out such nails with his teeth. Pallas apparently suffered great pain, but seemed to know that the operation would give him relief. He held the foot high and quietly of his own accord until all was finished, then flourished his trunk, trumpeted, and expressed almost in words his sincere thanks.

After paring the foot, each toe-nail is cut between and filed down, giving each foot a white, clean look with its settings of polished nails. It takes about six hours to finish dressing an elephant's feet, and it is said to be one of the hardest bits of work that the men have to do. While busy making the chips fly, Professor Arstingstall said: "Did you know that three times around an elephant's front foot is his exact height?" "No. Is that so?" "Yes, and to prove it, look here." Then he proceeded to measure the front foot of the brute, and three times its circumference was found, by mounting a ladder, to be the exact height of the animal.—Bridgeport (Conn.) letter in New Haven Register.

"OUIDA" ON FICTION.

A Little Episode from Real Life Which She Relates in an English Newspaper.

From the London Times.

I think the following story may interest your readers. I will not give the names of the persons concerned in it, but I will vouch for the absolute truth of the narrative, indeed, the little drama has been acted within a stone's throw of the gates. A cantatrice of obscure position had a lover in a Genoese gentleman who not only had many claims on her fidelity by reason of his devotion to her, but also to the education which he had given her when a poor girl, and the liberality which he had shown to her family; nevertheless, she betrayed this generous lover, and carried on an intrigue with a young noble of the neighborhood a youth much younger than herself and very rich. For some time the Genoese gentleman, only able to visit her at intervals in the Tuscan village where she lived, was without much difficulty deceived, and, when he did see the young noble, was assured that he was a relation of her betrothed. At last, however, his suspicions were fully aroused; instead of going back to Genoa he one day unexpectedly returned and had full proofs of the worthlessness of his siren.

He pursued his rival to his villa, and failing to provoke him to a duel swore that he would kill him. The carabineers intervening, he found himself deprived of his just vengeance, and, in the madness of his despair and agony, shot himself by the river's side, while his faithless mistress jeered at him from her open window, in the lovely stillness of the moonlit September eve. This was but a few nights ago; he is not dead, but still lies in great peril in a cottage near where he fell. The sympathy of the whole rural population is with this man, who at least knew how to love and how to avenge his honor. The village populace were with trouble prevented from lynching his worthless coquette; and the veteran brigadier of the guard wept like a child at the fate of this viitima d'amore. This is only one out of a thousand tragedies which yearly occur in this, the home of Romeo and Juliet, where love is not a dead letter. Why are not those who can love and suffer thus as deserving of portrayal in fiction as the epicine beings who know no woes but a passing hysteria of conscience or disillusion before the melting of a foggy and impalpable ideal?

Because passion has never touched with its fire and its glory the prim life of the æsthetic prig or the rotund Philistine, it is not for that reason perished off the face of the earth. It exists in the same force and the same favor as in the days of Othello and Stradella; and, I confess, seems to me much more filthy a subject for the novelist or the dramatist than the fictitious "realisms" of the spineless commonplace. After all, there is no more vivid reality than love. The Genoese lover lying here now, shot through the chest by his own hand because his generous faith had been deceived by a heartless mistress, is every whit as legitimate a centre of interest as Anthony Trollope's gossiping bishops or Henry James' heroines perplexed by a plethora or a paucity of proposals.

I remember when George Lawrence was told that the end of "Sword and Gown" was improbable. He answered "Improbable? Oh, very likely; only you see, it was true." The eternal sentiment is as real as the infinite prosaic. I believe I am sometimes accused of writing "fairy stories," but is not life itself very often a fairy story, if too often, alas! one in which the evil spirit preponderates, and the wishing cap is foolishly used by the unwise? To some of us, at least, a dreary and insipid story of an uneventful and unimpassioned life seems much more "unreal" (i. e., unlike our own experiences) than the most romantic narrative conceived by the wildest fancy. To many of us—to myself, I confess, among the number—the world seems a marvellous union of tragedy and comedy, which run side by side like twin children; like a "web of Tyrian looms," with the gold threads crossing and recrossing on the dusky purple of its intricate meshes.

The amorous, magnificent, heroic life of Skobeleff would, no doubt, seem incredible to the London litterateur, with his prim domesticities bound up in a duodecimo suburban villa, pampered by Morris, or the rural clergyman solemnly pacing his treadmill of weekly monotonies. At this moment, fighting for the French flag at Tonquin, is a young man, the fame of whose nom de plume (were I to give it here) you would at once recognize as that of one of the masters of French fiction; this gallant sailor is also a great musician and an admirable artist, and he may very likely die in a barbarous country (as Henri Riviere died) burying with him his genius, his youth and his marvellous and multitudinous powers. Well, is not this man every whit as "real" as Mr. Precisian Dulle, passing his life between a civil service desk and a house in South Kensington, or Mr. Smalle Joker penning his nameless fiction, which "never brings a blush on the cheek," etc., with his six daughters playing lawn tennis in his back garden, and his physical and mental vision limited to the chimney pots?

No doubt, all the world over, character creates circumstance, and the tortoise is not to blame if it cannot leap, only it need not disbelieve in the greyhound and the horse. No doubt "adventures are to the adventurous" in the most extended sense of the word, and romantic and brilliant lives will not fall to the lot of the dull and the mediocre. But such lives exist, nevertheless, and it is not true that a "pale uniformity extends like a pall over the whole of the human race.

A novel is not necessarily any the more like real life because it is a story about nothing, leading to nowhere, which might meander on through half a century for any climax that it ever reaches * * * I cannot suppose that my own experience can be wholly exceptional ones, yet I have known very fine characters, I have also known some very wicked ones, and I have also known many circumstances so romantic that were they described in fiction they would be ridiculed as exaggerated and impossible. In real life there are coincidences so startling, mysteries so singular, destinies so strange, that no wise novelist could venture to portray them for fear of making his work appear too bizarre and too melodramatic. That 'truth is stranger than fiction' is found in every turn in life. The world is not exclusively composed of the English middle class, varied with a few American young ladies. Would it not be well if lecturers or reviewers, before calling everything which seems strange to themselves unreal or unnatural, were visited with a wholesome doubt as to whether it might not be their own experiences which were limited?"

SIGHTS IN ASIA.

A Page or Two from Congressman Bookwalter's Book of Travels.

From the Cincinnati Enquirer.

If a man must see but one country in Asia let him by all means go to Japan. It is the land of courtesy, of sincerity of art and honor, too, Japan has but recently emerged from the feudal condition, and is the freshest child of modern times. Some of their institutions had a remarkable influence to compel good manners; for instance, the Hairi-Kairi. That is now abolished, I believe, but it was a strange institution. If you insulted a man he could go off and commit suicide by that method, and that compelled you who insulted him, to die in the same manner. You could not leave a stigma on a man and have it wiped off by his doing some violent thing to you. He went off calmly, and satisfied his honor by drawing his knife across his bowels, while a friend chopped off his head. The law was that you, who hurt the man's feelings and led him to die in the same way. Hence, men were particular how they behaved to each other, and even now their manners are the perfection of both self-respect and magnanimity."

"Did you go into this country where the French are fighting?"

"Oh, yes; I went up the river with some French officers. Saigon is the general port of that Annam country, and reminded me somewhat of Marseilles in France, though smaller. One of the most delightful towns I saw was in Batavia, in Java."

"What kind of a country is Annam?"

"It is just like the valley of the Mississippi. All the peninsulas of Southern Asia, such as Hindostan, Siam, Annam, etc., are the deltas of the great rivers which rise in the Himalaya Mountains and bring down their washings. That is why the country is so very rich. It has all the riches of the Mississippi Valley, with a more Southern and spontaneous climate and heat. Asia is a magnificent plateau, several thousand feet high, and from the enormous mountains there, which are the loftiest on the globe, these rivers, the Indies, the Ganges the Brahmapootra and the Irrawaddy, come down and bear with them the elements of the soil, and those are extended into the Indian ocean, and continents and great peninsulas, and toward the coasts the land is as flat as along our Gulf of Mexico.

"I think the finest building in the world is the marble mausoleum at Agra. It was built in a far remote past, but there is not a building in New York or the finish of these India buildings. The new Casino in New York is of the architecture of those India constructions, a mixture of Byzantine and Saracen, but it is the only one."

"What is this building at Agra?"

"It is a noble mosque or tomb erected by one of the Emperors to his wife, who died in child-birth, and cost about $2,000,000, equal to $20,000,000 at the present day. It is said that 20,000 men worked on it seventeen years, and their wages was a daily portion of corn. Every inch of that building is covered with descriptions in Arabic from the Koran. It is like a vision made out of clouds. It is about 240 feet high to its pinnacles, and occupied the centre of a noble square in architecture."

"How did you manage about money in Asia?"

"I had a cipher from the telegraph, and, putting money on deposit in New York, went into the banking houses from point to point, and they are just as plentiful in Asia as in Europe, and made myself known, and telegraphed, say three words, costing $5 a word, to New York, and the banker would say, 'Very well, sir, how much do you want? Will you have it in the Madras currency?"

ABOUT THE WEST.

A Man With an Appetite—The Country Where Everybody Works

A Letter to the New Orleans Times-Democrat.

Entering a sleeper in New York, you reach, without change, Chicago in twenty-four hours by the fastest line. Have your berth secured a day or two in advance or you find no place, for traveling seems to be an essential part of the life of the Northern people. In travel every thing conceivable is at hand for your comfort. On the train is a dining-car sumptuously furnished. Whatever you call for, from a toothpick to a bottle of champagne, is at your service. It was my first experience. I entered the dining-car, and was assigned to a seat opposite a large, portly gentleman. When the bill of fare was offered to him I saw him take from his pocket a lead pencil and begin to mark his wants. I thought he would never come to an end. By and by the waiter brought him his dinner. And such a dinner! I wouldn't and couldn't eat such a quantity for a week. In half an hour the dishes were empty, and it seemed he was far away from being full. His appetite was colossal. But in this country the stomach does a mighty work. I called for a few dishes and quietly went on with my frugal dinner, but I could not help but watch my vis-a-vis. When I had finished he was attacking his third piece of pumpkin pie. I will never forget that man, nor his amazing appetite. We reached Chicago in twenty-four hours. There was a long delay for breakfast, a change of cars, and away sped the train for Kansas City, Mo., another journey of twenty-four hours. The route lies through a rich and very fertile country. It was October. On either side of the railroad line were rich corn fields, and here and there long patches of small watermelons, which seemed abashed at the grandeur of the pumpkins. Now and then we passed stock farms, where the finest cattle I ever saw were grazing. At last we reached Kansas City, situated on the Missouri river. Hills and hollows everywhere, rain pouring down in torrents, and mud that can't be matched anywhere—this is what I first saw. Next day still poured the rain. Then a few bright days—but the mud is as stubborn as a mule and will not yield. Here you meet the western type of American civilization. Strong, brawny men, brusque in manner, bold without being impolite in speech—workmen all—rich and poor, meet you everywhere. This is no place for dudes. You find them in New York, Boston, Philadelphia (I wonder are any in New Orleans?) but they have no place in the West. I remarked that they speak here of the West with the same pride in which we do of the South. You had better not call them Yankees. They will accept the adjective Northern, but they prefer the title Western. This is a place of over 80,000 inhabitants. There are magnificent stones here, and a vast business is done. Everything is astir. It must be a beautiful place in summer. wherever I go I meet with exiles from home; they generally call on me: many are doing well in business, but some not so well; but they all are faithful to the memories of the past, and the most of them are often homesick and sigh for the South. In Leavenworth, Kan., and in St. Joseph, Mo., I met many of them. Last Sunday week I said mass in St. Joseph. An old confederate soldier, who has worn gray since the war, asked me to let him serve at mass. I, of course consented. The church was crowded. Over his gray pants up to his knees, he wore a pair of cavalry boots; he wore a gray jacket. The people were somewhat surprised at the sight, but he felt in serving the mass of the rebel priest somewhat of the same pride he felt as a soldier in our war.

FARM AND HOUSE.

Miscellaneous Recipes.

CHILBLAINS.—1. Sulphurous acid one ounce, distilled water two ounces. Mix and apply night and morning. 2. Rub the feet with snow. 3. Bathe in strong oak-leaf tea or in liquor from the tan vat heated hot. 4. Apply strong copperas water. 5. Hold the foot, with the sock on, as near the fire as can be borne, withdrawing it when too hot, and returning it again to the fire for five or ten minutes. One or two successive applications will effect a cure.

TO DYE SEA-GREEN.—One ounce blue vitriol, one half ounce alum; dissolve each separately in earthen vessels in hot pater; dip the goods in the alum water: drain and put them in the vitriol water; dry, and wash in saleratus water. This will color a pound of rugs, and makes very pretty ground work for rugs drawn with a rug-hook.

REMOVING WARTS.—A correspondent of the Philadelphia Ledger says: Some time ago the writer had numerous warts on his hands and he concluded that he would try a different orthodox remedy on each one and endeavor to ascertain which was the best. He accordingly tried chromic acid, bichromate of potassium, nitric acid, hydrocloric acid, nitro-muriatic acid, acetic acid, etc. After careful examination, I was fully persuaded that strong acetic acid, applied to the top of the wart, in very small quantity at a time, once or twice a day, was the best of the tried remedies, and afterwards succeeded in removing them all, in two or three weeks, by the application of this remedy. I found chromic acid to be entirely of too corrosive a character, and much inferior to strong acetic acid.

The secret of ventilation without draught is a little and constantly. The mere fact of living in a close atmosphere begets a shivery, susceptible condition of the body, which is intolerant of the slightest sensation of chill. If you accustom yourself and your children to fresh air, you become robust, your lungs play freely, the vital heat is sustained, and even a draught becomes exhilarating. All through the day, remember to have a small chink open at the tops of your windows; or, better still, raise the lower sash; close the opening beneath with a piece of wood fitting closely, and so the air will enter at the junction of the sashes, and pass upward without draught. —Dr. Russell.

What Will Our Girls Do With Themselves?

It is sad, very sad, to see philosophers, preachers and journalists, men whose bulging brains bear the impress of thought, and whose ideas sway mankind, go pottering along in the same old rute year after year instead of tackling live and important matters and questions, the discussion of which would be of infinite benefit to mankind. Age after age, year by year, from the days of Solomon to Philosopher Pickett, the intellects of the period have been wrestling with the problem, "What shall we do with our girl?" while the real question of importance, "what will our girls do with themselves?" has been entirely overlooked. The old and time-honored query argues a depth of ignorance about girl nature lamentable to a degree, for what men who had ever made the subject even a cursory study would ask it? Not the man learned in girl nature would ever ask, "What will our girls do with us?" The father of many girls would never ask a question which implies that any one could do anything with our girls at all; like the wise captain he would say, "What will the storm do with the ship!" not what will the ship do with the storm." A father with one girl might attempt to boss her, but it is not very likely that he would keep it up very long. The sire of a brace of daughters might attempt to guide them a little, but as soon as a man has three kid-gloves and matinee-ticket consumers on his hands he lets nature take its course, and at best only makes a feeble effort to stem the current of the feminine freshet by saying with an affectation of dignity to his wife "My dear, if you do not govern your daughters better, I shall have to take them in hand myself." The ever-present problem with the anxious father is not "What shall we do with our girls?" but "What will our girls do next?"

Sometimes the old folks sigh over the profligacy and degeneracy of the times, vowing that when they were young, girls were girls and behaved as such, but nowadays they seem to think that the balance of the world was only made to minister their whims and pleasure. The old folks say this when their livers are a bit "off," or the rheumatism gives them an extra tinge. Girls are girls, with just the same, pretty, dainty ways, the same power over men, the same love of admiration, the same great big hearts, full of love and affection, and just the same all over as the day when Eve first saw her person mirrored in a lake and sat down on the bank to admire it so long that the serpent had a chance to get in enough taffy to ruin the whole of posterity. The bread is the same, only types differ, made more striking by continuous reaching out in one direction by the evolution of species that has produced the huge poter pigeon and the fleet carrier pigeon from the parent of their race, the old blue rock.—San Francisco Alta.

Smoking and Storing Meat.

Mr. W. W. Tracy contributes to the Michigan Farmer this account of his method of smoking and storing meat, and urges the importance of keeping the room cool enough so that the fat of the hams or bacon will not ooze out "which is fatal to good flavor."

"We would build a house only large enough to hold the meats closely packed on flat shelves—extending from bottom to top—without a floor and the door should be so small as convenience in filling the house will admit. Eight feet from this we dig a fire-hole two and one-half feet across and about two deep; place a similar curbing of 2x4 around the top level with the surface, although if the expense is not objectionable it would be better to brick up the walls. From the bottom of this pot we lay a line of four-inch tile slanting to the surface, just inside of the threshold of our meat room, and another wooden pipe or log six inches square from the very top of one foot. In filling the house do not let the pieces touch each other, and be careful to lay each with the skin side down. It is much better to lay them in this way on slat shelves than to hang them up.

"Build a brisk fire in your pit and get well lighted a large maple knot, and then close the pit with a tight fitting shutter, stopping the crack between it and the curbing with earth. Your house will be instantly filled with smoke, the amount of which and the rapidity of the combustion of the log, a very little experience will enable you to completely control, by means of partially closing the opening of the tile leading to the bottom of the pit. If the house is tightly built it may be necessary to make an opening to admit fresh air and induce circulation. We have kept meats in fine condition all summer in such a house by making two ventilators covered with wire netting and arranged so as to be tightly closed when desired and filling the house with fresh smoke every five or six weeks. I hope every lover of good smoked meats will test this plan and see if it is not far superior to the old plan of a fire in the meat room itself."

Experience in the Potato Field.

Dr. Sturtevant, who has been conducting careful experiments to determine whether one portion of the potato is more valuable for seed than another, gives a tabulated report of the results in a recent bulletin sent out from the New York Agricultural Station.

The lesson taught from these tables appears to be that there is no inferiority of the seed end of the potato when used for seed. On the contrary the figures not only absolutely but relatively show the same advantage in the number of good potatoes.

Dr. Sturtevant says: "The general summary of our experience with the potato as heretofore represented, as well as the result of the present experiment, goes to show that the vitality of the eyes used as seed improves according to the position they occupy upon the potato toward the terminal position.

"During the season of growth the plants from the central eyes showed slightly more vigor of growth than did those plants from the end of the potato. This fact was, however, so little marked that it could only be observed by taking a comprehensive glance over the plat, which showed a slight undulation from the, in general, greater size of the central plants of the plot. While one experiment hardly affords sufficient data for the purpose of generalization, yet an experiment as carefully conducted as this one, and with the method of planting, should possess some value as indicating the influence of position upon the seed eyes used. We can, however, truthfully express the fact that in this experiment we have gained increase of crop from the eyes taken from the seed end portion of the potato, and we may be justified in coming to the general conclusion that until further evidence is obtained the seed-ends, hitherto rejected by many, may be considered of equal value with that portion of the potato usually selected for planting.

Kentucky Turkeys.

Mr. O. A. Gilman, Paris, Ky., ships each winter to New York and Boston a great bulk of blue-grass turkeys. The birds from that section of country are quite celebrated and bring best prices. The methods of dressing and packing are thus referred to in correspondence of The Cincinnati Commercial Gazette:

"After being driven from their homes in the blue grass pastures, the fowls are quartered in large pens adjoining the slaughter house. The killing is done by cutting the throat, and then allowing the fowl to hang with its head downward so that all the blood may drip from the body. Mr. Gilman employs from sixty to eighty colored women to remove the feathers. They, by practice, have become fast at the business, and while some familiar camp-meeting hymn is being sung, they move their hands with much dexterity. After the pick the fowls pass through the hands of a young man armed with a bludgeon, who with a single blow of his weapon, breaks the breast-bone, after which the abdomen is split open and the entrails carefully removed. After this the fowls are hung in the open air until all bodily heat has evaporated. Then the packing begins. The boxes are of uniform size, holding about twenty turkeys each. Seizing the fowl by the neck the legs are bent forward until they rest on the breast, this laid in the box, and the next one afterward, being treated likewise, laid so that the breast of the former will be between the legs of the latter. In this manner, lying cheek by jowl, like sardines in a box, all the space is utilized and the danger of bruising in shipment avoided."

A VOCATION FOR WOMEN.

Some Remarks by Oliver Wendell Holmes on a Proposed Dual Arrangement.

"Little things mean a great deal in the sick-room. 'Will you have an orange or a fig?' said Dr. James Jackson to a fine little boy now grown up to a goodly stature, and whom I may be fortunate enough to recognize among my audience of to-day. 'A fig,' answered Master Theodore, with alacrity. 'No fever there!' said the good doctor, 'or he would certainly have said an orange.' Now, it is just these little unimportant, all-important matters that a good nurse is of incalculable aid to the physician. And the growing conviction of the importance of thorough training of young women as nurses is one of the most hopeful signs of medical advancement. So much has been done and is doing that the days of the Sairey Gamps and Betsy Prigs are numbered. What is there in the hour of anguish like the gentle presence, the quiet voice, the thoroughly trained and skillful hand of the woman who was meant by nature and has been taught by careful discipline to render those services which tries to reward, but only gratitude can repay? I have always felt that this was rather the vocation of women than general medical, and especially surgical, practice. Yet I myself followed a course of lectures given by the younger Mme. Lachapelle in Paris, and if here and there an intrepid woman insists on taking by storm the fortress of medical education, I would have the gate hung open to her as if it were that of the citadel of Orleans and she were Joan of Arc returning from the field of victory. I have often wished that disease could be hunted by its professional antagonists in couples—a doctor and a doctor's quick-witted wife making a joint visit and attacking the patient—I mean the patient's malady, of course—with their united capacities. For I am quite sure that there is a natural clairvoyance in a woman which would make her as much a superior of a man in some particulars of diagnosis as she certainly is in distinguishing shade or color. Many a suicide would have been prevented if the doctor's wife had visited the victim the day before it happened. She would have seen in the merchant's face his impending bankruptcy while her stupid husband was prescribing for dyspepsia and indorsing his note; she would recognize the lovelorn maiden by an ill-adjusted ribbon—a line in the features—a droop in the attitude, a tone in the voice—which mean nothing to him, and so the brook must be dragged to-morrow. The dual arrangement of which I have spoken is, I suppose, impracticable, but a women's advice, I suspect, often determines her husband's prescription. Instead of a curtain lecture on his own failings, he gets a clinical lecture—on the puzzling case, it may be, of a neighbor suffering from the complaint known to village nosology as 'a complication of diseases,' which her keen eyes see into as much better than his as they would through the eye of a small-sized needle. She will find the right end of a case to get hold of, and take the snarls out as she would out of a skein of thread or a ball of worsted which he would speedily have reduced to a hopeless tangle."

WHAT NEW YORK TALKS OF.

The Elegant Ex-Editor of the World Discussed in the Candid Light of a Tuft Hunter.

Adelaide Detchon's Success, and Rev. Mr. Frothingham's Failure—Manicure and Matrimony Incompatible.

A Rash Social Heretic Who Declines to Be Instructed by "Don't"—Gossip of the Theaters.

NEW YORK, Special Correspondence, Nov. 14.—Mr. Henry Irving asked me the other day:

"Who is Mr. Hurlbert? Mr. William Henry Hurlbert?"

"He is a brilliant and accomplished American editor," I said; "who has graduated from this country and gone to Europe to live."

"He is quite rich, I believe?" he added, interrogatively; "for he has invited me to come up to his shooting-box in Sutherlandshire, in the very north of Scotland, and he gave me a fine package of letters of introduction to eminent Americans."

I did not think it in good taste for me to enter into explanations to him, but I can now tell him something about Mr. Hurlbert through the medium of your journal. Mr. Hurlbert, recently superseded by Mr. Joseph Pulitzer as editor of the World, is one of the most gifted journalists that America ever produced. He is essentially a great man. In law he would have made a distinguished jurist; in theology, a famous Archbishop; in politics, a leading senator. He possessed the overmastering qualities—a firm grasp of things, quick decision, rapidity, facility, boldness, elegant diction, scholarship, fine manners, a memory so retentive that he is an authority to all who know him. He never became a great editor, because, with all his mental wealth, he lacks the one vital possession, a "nose for news," and an instinctive knowledge of what the people want. So the World failed under his management, and Jay Gould gave him $50,000, on which he has retired to Great Britain, where he will doubtless spend the remainder of his life. He will never return to America. "D—n America!" he used to exclaim in talkative moments; "England is the only part of the world fit for a gentleman's residence." Hurlbert was born a century and a half too late, and on the wrong side of the planet. If he had been a crony of Steele and Pope and Addison when they met to take their gin under the Drury Lane theater, whither the latter had fled to escape from the torment of the vixen Countess of Warwick, I think his name would now be enrolled among the famous ones. But he postponed his birth fatally. Hurlbert is a trifle like Addison; like him in ripe scholarship, in delicacy of perception and sentiment, in a certain gentle humor; as to the gin, the "Elbows of the Mincio" will testify. He has no countess of Warwick, but is a perverse bachelor. His bachelor quarters in the old University building, Washington square, were fitted up in a style of oriental splendor fit for a prince; indeed, his few intimates spoke of him habitually as "Prince Henry," a title that well fitted him. He somewhat resembles King William of Prussia, and he cultivates the likeness.

This last fact, by the way, is a key to his character. He recognizes no human being as his equal, but considers all either his inferiors or superiors. Superiors are all who have wealth or title; inferiors, all others. To the former he is obsequious and sometimes sycophantic; to the latter, severe, discourteous, domineering. I never exchanged a word with Mr. Hurlbert in my life; indeed, he was not easily accessible to anybody; but I know that to his employes in the office he was often a terror. Mr. Hurlbert has a mania for titled people, as poor Mrs. Bobbins had for fried cucumbers, and he probably knows more of them than any other American—not excepting even Mrs. Paran Stevens. Like Tom Moore, he "dearly loves a lord;" and he loves anybody who can make him acquainted with a lord. He seeks to know a 'squire as a stepping stone to a baronet; he cultivates a baronet as a stepping stone to an earl. I have no doubt that he and the prince of Wales have a chummy acquaintance by this time. Everybody knows about his intimacy with the khedive of Egypt, which enabled him to wheedle that august personage into giving him Cleopatra's needle for Central park. He is now happy in England. He may sometime stray to Brazil, for he speaks Portuguese; to Italy, Prussia, Spain, for he is familiar with those languages, and would be at home; but he will never exile himself by returning to America. Hurlbert always was as lonesome out of England as John Keats was out of Greece.

MISS DETCHON IN ENGLAND.

Speaking of England, I am reminded of a young American girl who is making her mark there, and is about to come out in a London theater in a star part under first-rate auspices—Miss Adelaide Detchon. This lady possesses a very captivating sort of petite beauty, and a voice like a bird, which is trained to all sorts of bird utterances; and she has made a striking success in New York in a narrow range of characters, like Dolly, in Wives, a comedy, which she has bought. It is known to be almost impossible for an American to get a star engagement in London without paying a large bonus, but I have just received a letter from Miss Detchon which announces her success. Mrs. Labouchere, having had a falling out with Mrs. Langtry, has taken up the New York beauty—advised her, coached her, praised her, made way for her in society. On first arriving in England six months ago, Miss Detchon (pronounced De-shon, accent on last syllable) spent some weeks at Stratford, where or whereabouts, in a plain blue flannel dress (or gown, as they always say in England), she ransacked all the haunts of Shakspeare, and shouted her favorite parts through the woods and over the hills—a pretty vision, doubtless, to the rustics of those parts. She went to London, and Mrs. Labouchere and husband became her influential friends, and for some months, now, she has been shining in the houses of the nobility. At last Mr. Edgar Bruce, manager of the new London theater to which the prince of Wales has given his name, decided to accord her a hearing as a candidate to open that fine place of amusement.

"I have just been through a most trying ordeal," she says in her letter. "In my appearance before Mr. Bruce, everything depended on being in good health and voice. Alas! I caught a slight cold, which tightened and tightened, and closed down on my voice, which grew dimmer and dimmer. The vital day came. I was reduced to a whisper and a gasp. I resolved not to run the risk of postponement, but to call up all my resources and depend on pantomime. I did it. Desperately I went ahead. I danced and frolicked recklessly. I sang like a creaking door. I chirruped like a frog. I bobolinked without the bobble. Well, I won. And now I hold a contract with Mr. Bruce, by the terms of which he brings me out properly as a star during the gay London season, on terms highly advantageous and satisfactory to me."

On this very point a New York manager showed me a letter from London yesterday which said: "Little Miss Detchon, who made such a hit in Wives, has been engaged to open to open the Prince's, at the same salary that was paid Langtry here." I know a lot of young men here who are so badly mashed on Adelaide that some of them will be very likely to go over to be present on the great occasion.

DR. FROTHINGHAM'S CHURCH.

On the retirement of Rev. Mr. Frothingham from the platform of the Third Unitarian society here, four years ago, the church became inert and lifeless, as the members had been drawn together mainly by his peculiarly radical views and powerful method of statement. As they had not been attracted by any phase of religious feeling, but only by a variety of theological thought, they could not be held together when the magnet disappeared. They were pure deists or theists, believers in one God only, and in Him, not as a personality, but as the Soul of Things; and this they declared Jesus himself to have been, whom they never spoke of as Christ more than Matthew Arnold does. The Fraternity club, too, an interesting gathering of the brightest members of the congregation, which met one evening in the week and discussed moral and philosophical topics, gradually faded away and became extinct. Then it was reported that Mr. Frothingham, who had gone to Europe for his health, had become orthodox, had become a Catholic, was insane, and various similar improbabilities, all of which were untrue. But Mr. Frothingham did not return here, and probably will not. He is now feeding on the transcendental ambrosia of Boston. The church has dissolved this week, and will not reorganize. Some of the members will go to Collyer's, but more will stay at home and do their own thinking—the marked tendency of all theists. The Times reports the society "in serious financial difficulty," but this is an error. I happen to know that all the debts are paid and considerable property is left. I was talking with Mr. George H. Putnam (of Putnam's sons) about it yesterday, and he thought it rather unusual for a church that had "gone out of business" to have a respectable surplus on hand. He is right; and I may add here that the excellent financial condition of the church is owing largely to Mr Putnam's own thoughtful oversight.

CORNS AND BUNIONS.

Two summers ago in Saratoga I was attracted into a building by the sign, "Dr. Gray, the world's first manicure." As I entered, a boy, at a side door, said in a coaxing inflection, "This way, sir. Right in this room." And on the stairs a colored boy shouted: "This way! Right up here! Shut no, you chucklehead." How happy could I be with either; so I walked upstairs.

"I am Dr. Pray," said a gentleman who met me at the door. "There is no other. The woman downstairs is a fraud." And he wiped the perspiration from his brow.

"I heard her boy try to get you in there. She used to be my wife. I taught her the business. I lived with her as long as I could, and then got away from her, or tried to, but she follows me everywhere. I opened these rooms, and she came and hired the front rooms downstairs, and set up the same business, so that my patients have to go right by her door. She is the worst woman in the world. Corns, sir?

I explained, apologetically, that I strayed in out of curiosity, just to see what sort of business was carried on there. He kindly told me about the process. Two men were being treated. "Good day!" he said, as I took leave, "don't stop down stairs. Go right by!" As I went out, the boy at the lower door halted me, and confidentially placed in my hand a handbill, beginning, "Mrs. Pray. The Great American Manicure! No connection with the concern up stairs!" Yesterday, in an enquiring frame of mind, I walked into Mrs. Pray's New York establishment, and said to the lady who received me:

"Is Dr. Pray in?"

"Yes, I am Dr. Pray," she said.

I started in surprise, remarking, "I thought Dr. Pray was a man!"

"Well, he ain't a man!" she retorted, sharply. "The one you mean is across the street, yonder. He ain't half a man! Always following me around, and squatting down near my place of business. The idea of his pretending to be an artist! Corns, sir? I can treat them for you, or we have a man who is thoroughly expert and skillful."

A young man sat leaning in an easy chair by the window, that was closely curtained with lace. His feet, encased in patent leather pumps, were on an ottoman that rested on a Turkish rug. His arm was lying idly outstretched, and a rather pretty girl held his hand, palm downwards, and was briskly rubbing his finger nails with a chamois brush. On a little table at her side was a box of powder and a sort of paint paste, which she seemed to be using. They were chatting gayly of some performance. The opera, I conjectured. I explained that I did not wish to see Dr. Gray professionally, but I would go over there a moment.

"Ah, a bill, no doubt! He is in a strait, I hear, and can't meet his expenses. Don't think he will keep open much longer. Good morning."

I called "across the way" at the rival establishment, also luxuriously fitted up. Seeing that the doctor had forgotten me, I asked, "Is Mrs. Pray in?"

"No, I am glad to say she isn't. I left her years ago. I am Dr. Pray. Her place is over yonder; she is always following me around. She was formerly my wife. Thank God for the 'formerly!' The idea of her undertaking this profession! She doesn't know any more about it than a child! Every month or two all her hands leave her; can't stand her; quit her; and she has to hire a green lot of people and put 'em right onto people's extremities!! This profession requires delicate treatment, but she butchers 'em. You'd ought to see the procession of cripples that comes over here after they have been treated by her—some of 'em on crutches!"

The doctor occupied a large floor for his operations, and had several assistants. Many ladies call on a manicure every day of the year. Hundreds of others have a manicure, generally a female, call on them every day at their own residences, to keep their finger nails oval, smooth and pink. But the practice of the "profession" seems to have a singularly estranging effect on spouses.

DON'T.

The little unpretentious brochure, Don't, is having such a tremendous sale that its writer, Mr. O. B. Bunce, of Appleton's, will probably not object to dropping his anonyma of "Censor." Here, set in eighty small pages, are over 300 prohibitions, telling briefly what not to do in society, what improprieties to avoid in conduct, speech and dress at the theater, at home, on the cars, at the table. As in all utterances of this sort, one can easily find something to dissent from.

For instance, "Don't eat soup from the end of a spoon, but from the side." Such a rule cannot be called established. The very shape of a spoon proves that it was meant to be eaten from at the end, and to sip from the side successfully without spilling, especially if the diner has a full mustache, is a difficult feat. At the same time the position of the arm is more graceful, if one sips from the side. It is no sort of consequence which mode is adopted—it is merely a question of taste.

"Don't break an egg into a cup. Always eat it from the shell." Unless a canon of manners be founded in some obvious reason, it may probably be disregarded. That is the case with this.

"Don't have your shoes polished in the street." This might have been omitted, for to do what is forbidden is always neat and often necessary.

"Don't sit cross-legged." (To men.) Wherefor?

"Don't say 'vest' for 'waistcoat.'" This depends on where one is. If in England, Canada or Australia he should say "waistcoat," or perchance "weskit," but if in the United States he should fearlessly say "vest."

"Don't say 'right away' if you wish to avoid Americanisms." Certainly, but why should an American wish to avoid Americanisms? "Right away" is a good and expressive phrase to add to the language, as Americans have added scores of strong words and phrases. As America contains a majority of all English speaking people, they should not be shy about making valuable additions to the common language.

"Don't say 'I am through' when announcing that you have finished your dinner." "Don't use the word 'fix' in the sense of putting in order." Why not? Both are good strong Saxon. "I am through" means exactly what it is used to express; and the word "fix" was employed in England 200 years ago in this very sense of arranging or repairing.

"Don't address a letter to 'Mrs. Louise Smith,' but to 'Mrs. Charles Smith.'" This is solely a question of taste. The fact is that "Mrs. Charles Smith" is not the lady's legal name; but "Mrs. Louisa Smith" is.

"Don't say 'sick,' except when nausea is meant. Say 'ill,' 'unwell,' 'indisposed.'" This rule cannot be justified. The general application of the word is established; moreover, this is exactly the meaning it had in England when Shakspeare wrote and the Bible was translated.

There is no doubt that these "don'ts" were introduced by the author mainly as a concession to some current manual, rather than by his own suggestion. Making allowance for these, there is a body of valuable hints, direction and suggestion, which it is important for all persons to know who have any ambition to speak correctly, or expect even to go into polite society. The sixtieth thousand has been sold.

THEATRICAL BITS.

In the operatic war Mapleson stands on the defensive. Abbey has captured some of the enemy's outworks, and dug rifle pits and zigzags up to his magazine. Patti is sick. So is Mapleson. But the fight is not good for anybody, for war is an expensive luxury.

Fedora, with its exciting scenes between Mantell and Fanny Davenport, has proved such a great success that the manager has secured the Fourteenth street theater for another month.

M. De Vivo, the well known impresario, has gone out to visit the smaller cities with a fine company of opera singers, Mme. Cagli, Brignoli, Lithgow, James, Ross and Miss Dickerson. The whole country is likely to get a taste of operatic flavors this season.

LABOR AND PAIN.

Labor is living, and pain is living;
And labor and pain go hand in hand,
And peer in the windows across the land;
And so, wherever love is giving
Labor for pain, or pain for labor,
Each to the other is nearly neighbor.
Yea, these are the millstones of the heart,
Upper and nether, but never apart;
And the grist of the grinded grain goes down
In flaky showers from the kernels brown.
And labor is living, and pain is living;
And love goes onward, striving and giving;
And, the wheels go round, and the sheaves are bound,
And the grist of the mill is grimly ground;
But therefrom cometh, when all is said,
The hope of the heart and the world's white bread.

PREADAMITE JOURNALISM.

Antiquarian Researches Into the History of the Boston Post and Its Writers.

Newspaper Methods of the Last Century—Some of the Novelties of Early Boston Journalism.

BOSTON, Mass., Special Correspondence, Nov. 14.—One evening, recently, a number of the well-known journalists of this city dropped into the "hell-box," one by one, and, after taking seats, lighting cigars and marking the location of the spittoon, proceeded to discuss the result of the recent election and the cause which led to Butler's defeat. But what is the "hell-box"? is probably asked. That is the name given the room in the office of a large Boston daily newspaper where those who have nothing to do for the time being meet sociably, play poker, spin yarns and smoke borrowed tobacco until the rightful occupant of the room gets mad and turns out everybody most unceremoniously. On the next occasion, some other room is selected, and so on. Among those who made up the party was Tom Maguire, whom I have previously introduced to the readers of the PIONEER PRESS as the Joe Howard of Boston. Said Tom:

"I think the newspapers of this city had a great deal to do with the defeat of Butler, especially the Herald, which has fought him at every turn since he has been in politics. Of the half dozen dailies in Boston but one supported Butler, as you know, while the rest, including the old Post, pitched into him red-hot. Speaking of the Post, how it has died out in power and prosperity? Once it was the official organ for New England of the national administration when Democratic presidents occupied the White House and made money rapidly; now it is repudiated by the State Democracy, with the exception of the old liners, and can scarcely keep its head above water. I remember the Post away back in its infancy, but not at its birth. Col. Charles Gordon Greene, who is still alive, was its founder. Col. Greene was born and bred a journalist, and he proved to be a most successful one. When a youth he worked on the Boston Statesman, which was the predecessor of the Post, and later, with James A. Jones (I think that was his name), published the first daily newspaper in Pennsylvania, I think at Philadelphia. Jones was a Philadelphian. In 1831 he started the Boston Post and for over forty years worked upon it in one way or another, principally as editor-in-chief. He was a brilliant and witty writer, and "talked sense." He always had an opinion, and was never afraid to express it. His friendship was esteemed by all men, and his private room was often visited by such men as Franklin Pierce, George Bancroft, David Henshaw, who first gave the printed ballot to Massachusetts voters, and established the claim that jurors should be the judges of law as well as of fact; William Pitt Fessenden, Robert Rantoul, Jr., Horace Greeley, Nathaniel P. Willis, the poet, whose career began with the Statesman, Caleb Cushing and others. Col. Greene rarely ever got angry at anything, but if any one tried to bulldoze him, his temper would get the better of his judgment occasionally. He was always the fighting editor of the paper. One morning a good many years ago, I well remember the affair, an actor named Haupt, of the crushed tragedian style, came into the office in great rage and announced his intention to lick the whole shop on account of an adverse criticism upon his acting which the Post had made. The colonel answered the inquiry made for the man who had dared to say that about him, and tried to pacify the irate actor. He smoothed him down to the best of his ability and gradually led him out to the head of the stairway. At that point the actor saw how he was being soft-soaped, and, becoming provoked at the idea of being bowed into the street without receiving any satisfaction, aimed a blow at the colonel. This was too much for the fighting editor, and he gave the actor a 'daisy' under the jaw that sent him head over heels down the entire flight of stairs. The compositors, hearing the noise, rushed out and saw the colonel running down stairs, pale and frightened, while at the bottom lay the actor perfectly motionless, pale and apparently lifeless. After a moment of painful suspense Haupt sprang to his feet and shouted to the colonel, 'You shall hear from me again, sir!' whereupon the colonel, after recovering from his fright, said wittily: 'Thank God, I hear from you now, sir;' and went back to his office to congratulate himself that he had not killed the fellow.

On another occasion a Chinese musician, who was performing in the city, became almost insane over something that had been said about his performances in the Post. After the custom of his country he visited the colonel's office and violently demanded that he should finish the affair by killing him. The colonel cooly took the banjoician by the collar and the bosom of his pantaloons and ran him out upon the sidewalk where he told the Chinaman that, if he was in a hurry to become an angel and fly back to pig tail's land, he could kill himself. Another funny thing I remember about the colonel was his celebrated notice of one of the Harper's books, entitled 'Atlantis, a Story of Sea.' It was something like this, and pleased the whole city:

"We have read seventy-nine pages of this tale, of which we can find neither head nor tail. Forgive us, O Time, for wasting thy sands. It seems to be a kind of dramatic 'talk' in which verse (and blank in everything else) between two or three jack-o'-lanterns, a lot of lightning bugs and a star fish, written under the inspiration of carbonic acid, gas and cold water at 30 deg. fahrenheit upon an iceberg. It is certainly a supernatural thing—'a devil without brimstone.'"

THE POST'S EARLY METHODS.

In the early days of the Post there was really but little work done in the securing of news. The paper mainly depended upon the journals printed in New York for its news outside of New England. All other news came by mail, from a day to a week or more old. But the public did not care so much about news then, as it does now. The only communication between the new and old world was by packets, and very often nothing was heard from Europe for a month. Whenever a packet arrived in port, then the papers would show their enterprise by not going to press until after 7 o'clock in the evening. As soon as a packet was sighted a race would be made by the representatives of each paper in a boat to board it first, and thereby secure the first reading of the foreign papers. The successful editor was bound by severe rule not to cut the papers, and after reviewing them was obliged to pass them to the second comer. In case of a scarcity of news the same file of papers went around a second time, and matter that was at first thought to be unimportant would be printed for want of better material. Just think of it! News a month old, and second-handed at that, when now we have columns each day from the old world and nothing is thought of it. For a long time after the Post was established there were no reporters engaged upon it. But little attention was paid to local news. If an item was brought in it was generally printed, but no one was sent after an item, except in rare cases. Nearly all that pertained to local affairs was stated in an editorial way. When a fire occurred not too far off it was customary for one of the compositors to drop his stick and go out and get a paragraph about it. Among the type-stickers who were most successful in writing up fires, etc., was Thomas Gill, who showed such an aptitude for that kind of work that he was finally allowed to do it altogether. He thereby became the first reporter in Boston. It was his delight to report the doings of the municipal court, and he handled it in such a peculiar and witty manner that he was nicknamed Counsellor Gill. A dozen years ago William E. Sawyer, who was the inventor of the Sawyer system of electric light distribution, and who died quite recently, did that kind of work for the Post quite acceptably. One 17th of June Gill was sent over to Bunker Hill to report the celebration proceedings. Edward Everett was the orator of the day, and Gill secured a seat just beside him. Just as Everett was saying that the descendants of the sires who fought at Bunker Hill, upon the battle-crowned hill upon which he stood, deserved the grateful recognition of the audience, Gill whispered "My father was in that battle." Everett heard him, and seeing the opportunity of making a point, continued: "And here we have an honored son of one of those veterans, and I call upon you, sir," turning to Gill, "to stand up and show yourself before this audience, that they may recognize you." But Gill would not stand up, and when Everett had finished his oration he sought Gill, and began to apologize for the liberty he had taken. "Oh," returned Gill, "no apology is necessary; I should have risen at your call, only my father was on the other side."

SOME OF ITS WRITERS.

In later years quite a number of writers, now noted, contributed to the columns of the Post, among them being John G. Saxe, whose pseudonym was Jeeme; B. P. Shillaber—Ichabod and Mrs. Partington; Joseph Field, the father of Kate Field, wrote poetry; John Brougham, the actor, wrote squibs; George Bancroft, the historian, and many others known to fame. George Makepeace Towle, the author, might also be mentioned, and George Alfred Townsend, or Gath. Townsend became connected with the paper in this way: He was in Boston to write up the Harvard college commencement for some New York paper. He called upon Mr. Nat Greene (son of the colonel) at the office of the Post, and happened to ask what he could do for him. There was a scarcity of reporters in the office just then, and Mr. Greene seized upon the opportunity to obtain a column introduction to the account of the exercises at Harvard. Townsend consented and sat down to a desk, which Mr. Greene, catering to Townsend's peculiarities, had adorned with a dozen good cigars, half a dozen pencils, several pens and a fresh bottle of ink. In a remarkably short time the article was completed, and so pleased Mr. Greene that he gave Townsend a roving commission to go where he would and to write what he pleased. Mr. B. P. Shillaber, who is well known to the world as Mrs. Partington, made a reputation upon the Post that introduced him to the American public as one of the most popular humorists of his time. He became connected with the Post about 1840, I think, as a compositor, among his associates being U. C. Hazewell, who has just died; Luther Colby, now publisher of the Banner of Light; Lewis Fisher, now of St. Paul, Minn.; Judge Charles H. Fernald of Santa Barbara, and others. It was about 1847 that Mr. Shillaber got his literary start. About the time that the Jamestown started for Ireland with relief for the starving poor, Mr. Colby, who worked with Shillaber, wrote a spread-eagle poem appropriate to the departure of the vessel, and sent to Col. Greene for publication. It was subsequently found on the floor torn to pieces. Shillaber thought the Post had published a good many poems worse than that, and he thought he would try and get even with the colonel by writing a worse one, which should be sent to him from Cambridge, as if from a Harvard student. Shillaber dictated it to Mr. Simpson, now of the Belfast (Me.) Journal, who copied it and had it sent to the Post. Col. Greene saw merit in it and published it. "I came across a copy of it the other day," said Tom, "and copied it to send to a newly-married friend of mine. Here it is, I will read it to you:

THE HENPECKED.

Showing the remarkable pliancy of the masculine disposition when softened in the alembic of conjugality.

We saw him at break of day, young man,
Deep delving in miry clay, young man,
A full rod or more
From the turfy shore,
And the water all round him lay, young man.

November's blast blew drear, young man,
But he seemed not to feel nor to fear, young man,
But knee-deep he stood
And delved in the mud
And we thought it confounded queer, young man.

The neighbors, they gathered around, young man,
For they feared that he would be drowned, young man,
But he seemed not to heed
A word or deed,
Nor uttered a single sound, young man.

But his singular toil he plied, young man,
His arms thus thrust 'neath the tide, young man,
And we now and then saw
From his dexter claw
Something drop in a pail by his side, young man.

Excitement grew stronger and higher, young man,
And patience began to tire, young man,
When he turned to the shore
And his digging gave o'er,
And washed from his brogans the mire, young man.

And when he had reached the land, young man,
He spoke to the people at hand, young man,
In a dismal-like tone
Which the married alone
Seemed fully to understand, young man.

"Of each and every want, my friends,
Which a woman's mind can haunt, my friends,
There are certain times
When nor seasons, nor climes,
Nor reasons can hinder the grant, my friends.

"For clams, wife raises her clamor, my friends,
And her tongue runs like a trip-hammer, my friends;
And I've come here to-day,
In this comfortless way,
To appease her longing, d—n her, my friends."

Then he mournfully shouldered his pail, young man,
And he looked like a year-long in jail, young man,
And his neighbors all wept,
As from them he stepped,
For they felt the sad truth of his tale, young man.

"From this poetic effusion," said Tom, "succeeded the Partington papers. The first were published in this wise. News came one evening that flour was selling at remarkably high prices at the Magdalen islands, in the Gulf of St. Lawrence. One of the compositors, George Bailey, remarked, 'I don't care a d—n what the price is in the Magdalen islands, I always have to give so much for half a dollar's worth.' It appeared so queer to Shillaber that he at once set up the lines, 'Mrs. Partington has always noticed that whether flour is dear or cheap, she had invariably to pay the same money for half a dollar's worth.' The idea of giving Mrs. Partington something to say was fresh and bright, and the paragraph was copied by other papers. Shillabar wrote some more, which seemed to 'take' equally well. Col. Greene was in Saratoga at the time, and, noticing the paragraphs, wrote back to Jackson, who took his place during his absence, asking, 'who the d—l is Mrs. Partington?' Upon his return he learned that Shillaber spoke for the old lady, and complimented him for his wit. Encouraged by his success in this direction, Shillaber kept on, and contributed poems upon the occasion of the introduction of water into Boston and the dedication of the Franklin statue. He afterward went upon the Saturday Evening Gazette, where he wrote many of the Partington papers, and also the humorous Blifkins papers. A great many more interesting stories might be told of the old Post and the men who worked upon it; but that is enough for to-night," saying which Tom closed his remarks.

Cutting the Atalanta in Two.

Philadelphia Special: Several hundred persons assembled at Cramp's dry dock to-day to witness the cutting in two of Gould's steam yacht Atalanta, in accordance with the order of her owner. The yacht was placed on the dry dock, after having some of her upper work, smoke-stacks and light iron removed, at the upper yard. She was then cut down to the keel amidships by removing or driving out each separate rivet, and removing the interior work of the vessel. The forward part of the vessel was placed on a movable frame work and attached to crabs or capstans worked by forty men, who in a short time had the sections so parted that there was a space of sixteen feet between them. The improvements will give additional space to the saloon as well as a private room on deck for the millionaire himself. The butcher shop, as well as other annoyances in the forward part of the vessel, will be removed aft. The repairs to the Atalanta will cost not less than $40,000. Her rig will be changed from a three to a two-masted schooner, the main mast having been removed.

HERO AND HEROINE.

"A prince there was, named Nala, Virasen's noble breed,
Goodly to see, and virtuous; a tamer of the steed;
As Indra 'midst the gods, so he of kings was kingliest one,
Sovereign of men, and splendid as the golden glittering sun;
Pure, knowing scripture, gallant; ruling nobly Nishadh's lands;
Dice-loving, but a proud, true chief of her embattled bands;
By lovely ladies lauded; free, trained in self-control;
A shield and bow; a Manu on earth; a royal soul!

* * * * * * *

Stately and bright and beautiful did Damayanti grow;
No land there was which did not the slender-waisted know;
A hundred slaves her fair form decked with robe and ornament,
Like Sachi's self to serve her a hundred virgins bent;
And 'midst them Bhima's daughter, in peerless glory dight,
Gleamed as the lightning glitters against the murk of night;
Having the eyes of Lakshmi, long-lidded, black, and bright:
Nay,—never gods, nor Yakshas, nor mortal men among,
Was one so rare and radiant e'er seen, or sued, or sung
As she, the heart-consuming, in heaven itself desired."

SCANDALS OLD AND NEW.

Reminiscences of Adah Isaacs Menken and the Way She Came to Be Photographed in the Arms of the Aged Dumas.

Plucky Mme. Clovis Hugues and the Method She Adopted to Avenge Her Slandered Honor.

PARIS, Special Correspondence, Oct. 31, 1883.—A few nights back M. Larochelle, one of the managers of the Gaiete theater, found himself seated alongside of a good-looking English girl in the Winter circus, away up yonder by the old Bastille grounds. His fair neighbor made a remark about one of the riders which led him to suppose that she, too, was an artiste; and, as this was really the case, they soon got into conversation. What she wanted was "a chance;" and in the end the manager asked her to come and see him the next day at his private office. She kept the appointment; and then the manager said that if she had the fine form which he had guessed she possessed, he would give her a good engagement. She soon proved to him that her physical proportions were most excellent; and the engagement was made, six months, at 500 francs a week. The next day the manager informed the press, and the press told the public, about the Gaiete's director getting into conversation with the handsomest woman that ever was seen; how he asked for her name; how her reply, "Miss Ken," suggested the name of Menken, who years ago made such a success at the Gaiete in the Pirates de la Savane; and the theatrical reporters wound up their remarks with the information that Miss Ken will soon appear in the same spectacular piece which brought Adah Isaacs Menken-Heenan so prominently before the Parisian public. I saw the Menken once, in Louisville, during the "wah." She was playing in that city, and Mitchell's army corps was camped at Lebanon Junction and Elizabethtown. Ten thousand "blue-bellied Yankees" wanted to see her in the Three Fast Women, and I wrote her a note to the effect that if she'd put herself up for a benefit and play that naughty piece, we'd pack the house. She wrote me an autographic letter, in which she fixed the date, named the play, and hoped we'd all put in an early appearance, which we did, in number about a thousand. And how we applauded when Menken came on! and how she "gagged" her part with references to the "boys in blue," and "brave soldiers;" and then she suddenly said something about the Nineteenth Illinois, which caused about a hundred of us fellows to yell ourselves hoarse; for that was "ours;" and was there ever such an honor given another regiment? That was the first and only time I ever saw this famous, well-shaped person; but I always had a "hankerin" after her photographs; and looking some of them over to-day I find one of her in her Pirates de la Savane costume—a pair of tights, and a silk skirt equally close-fitting—also a curious picture which in its day made no little stir. It represents an old man with gray wooly hair and moustache, and a sensual, laughing face of the African type, who is seated in his shirt-sleeves, holding a handsome and admirably-formed woman, in a full suit of tights, in his arms, whose head is nestled lovingly to his ample breast. The photograph is that of Alexandre Dumas pere and Adah Menken. When she was introduced to Dumas the celebrated author was living in the Boulevard Malesherbes, near the Park Monceaux, with his daughter, Madame Petel, a rather odd personage, who divided her time between religious practices, the painting of pictures of devotional character, and the translation into French verses from the works of the Greek poet Theocritus. Alexandre Dumas, who had become a firm believer in spiritualism and magnetism, had fallen into the hands of a lot of charlatans and rogues, who took advantage of his credulity in every conceivable way. The chief of these were two female mediums, who had wormed themselves into his confidence, and who rarely, if ever, left him, even when he went on a journey. They were both handsome women, and they had acquired much influence over the old fellow, to whom they sought to render themselves indispensable. It was a strange spectacle to see this talented man, after twenty years of avowed atheism, during which he had scouted at everything that in the least approached the supernatural, allowing himself to be deceived by the pretended magnetic sleep of two girls, and accepting the most transparent tricks as supernatural prodigies.

HOW ADAH CAUGHT HIM.

Adah Isaacs Menken, after a more than usually fast life, had "got religion" in America, whence she had just come accompanied by her mother and a sort of private chaplain, to whom she submitted all questions that troubled her conscience. As soon as she met Dumas, she saw that if she played her cards right she could get the very biggest kind of an advertisement out of the intimacy which almost immediately sprung up between them. The old fellow was like wax in the hands of this pretty woman; and he soon allowed himself to be taken in the toils of flattery and petting that the shrewd actress cast around him. It was not a hard thing for her to persuade him to have their picture taken in the position that I have described, it being understood between them that the photograph was to be solely for their joint admiration. A week later it was in every show window in Paris, thousands of copies were sent to England and the United States, and Tout Paris was laughing over the joke which was a huge advertisement of the handsomest ecuyere of the capital. No one considered Dumas as a pattern of virtue; but this exhibition was too much, even for the depraved appetite of Paris, and the scandal it stirred up was tremendous. At first Dumas tried to laugh the matter down, as he had laughed down so many previous scandals with which his name had been connected; but his son got angry, and wrote a very sharp letter to his father, in which he insisted that something should be done to put an end to the exhibition that was rendering their name ridiculous. Upon this Dumas had the photographs seized and began a suit against the photographer. The matter came before the courts, and Dumas had the audacity to be present at the argument. For two whole hours he was the butt of the eloquence and wit of the attorney for the photographer, and he revenged himself by stepping up to the legal gentleman at the close of his speech and, warmly congratulating him in open court, invited him to dinner in a tone audible over the whole room. The court ordered the photographer to destroy the negative, but the incident has remained the one which has been most unfavorably interpreted against the novelist, who, according to his friends, was in it only the dupe of a sharp woman. Dumas and Menken are both dead; but there is another personage, one who has played a far more important role in the affairs of this world, who once allowed himself to be cajoled in a similar way by a pretty woman. The story is not a very old one; and who is there that now remembers having seen in the shop windows of Berlin a photograph of Prince Bismarck and the actress Medori clasped in each other's arms?

SAPEK.

Just now the whole Quartier Latin is in a fever of delight. When two students meet in a beer saloon the first words exchanged are:

"Do you know Sapek?"

"Certainly."

"Well, he has just been appointed conseiller de prefecture."

"Impossible!"

"Here it is in the Journal Official."

And the official organ of the government is turned to and the appointment of Mr. Bataille as chief law officer of the prefect is read by the newcomer with hilarious stupefaction. This Bataille is a fellow who for several years has been known in the Quartier Latin by the sobriquet of "Sapek," and whose practical jokes have made him a Parisian celebrity. He was adored by his fellow students and feared by the police, to whom, whenever they arrested him—which was on an average of once a week—he would say, with an air of authority, "I am the illustrious Sapek." Over the students he exercised a wonderful amount of influence, a sort of royalty that no one contested; and his arrests on more than one occasion came near causing serious riots. The most celebrated of them was the affaire du Luxembourg, as it was called. Sapek, having seen fit to exhibit himself in the gardens of the Luxembourg in a complete Highland costume of the sixteenth century with his face and hands blacked to an Ethiopian darkness, was run in by the police and locked up in the Saint Sulpice jail. When the boys found out where he was they assembled in a tumultuous crowd before the jail and yelled and howled until the police, beginning to fear that the riot might grow serious, decided to give Sapek back to his loving subjects. The chief victims of Sapek's practical jokes were the concierges, for which class of domestic tyrants he had an especial hatred; and many were the pranks that he played on these "chevaliers du cordon." He even started a little paper entitled the Anti-Concierge, which had some success among the students. One night all the porters in the Rue Racine were suddenly awakened by vigorous pulls at their door bells. They pulled the latch string, and, hearing no one enter, were forced to get up to close the doors. As they naturally looked out into the street to see who it was that had rung their bells, and saw no one but each other, every concierge became convinced that he was the victim of one or more of his confreres; and a lively discussion, which almost ended in blows, ensued.

THE LATEST SCANDAL.

The scandalous attack upon the good name of Mme. Clovis Hugues, wife of the deputy from Marseilles, is the talk of the town—in fact, of the entire country. Last September this estimable lady was brought into public notice in the most outrageous manner. M. Le Normand, who was having a suit for separation against his wife—who was the Countess Osmont du Tillet when he married her—informed the deputy that the name of Mme. Clovis Hugues was being dragged into the affair; that Mme. Le Normand was going to prove by false witnesses that he (her husband) had been guilty of indiscretions with Mme. Hugues when she was still Mlle. Royannez. M. Clovis Hugues knew, as everybody else believes, that this charge was absolutely false; and he needed not the solemn denial which his wife made to assure him of this fact. But Mme. Clovis Hugues, not at all satisfied with the renewed assurance of her husband's love, commenced a suit against the woman that had thus libeled her, and to whom she gave notice that if her name or reputation was any further troubled, she would go to her house and shoot her dead. The case against this calumniatrice was set for the 30th of November; and except that it was believed Madame Le Normand was paying out money to private detectives to encourage them to make up false evidence against the deputy's wife, the affair has rested quiet for almost two months. Day before yesterday, however, Mr. Clovis Hugues received a letter signed by the Baron de la Pleze, informing him that Mme. Le Normand had just paid one of these detective agencies 25,000 francs to manufacture evidence against Mme. Hugues.

A few minutes after receiving the latter—it is the deputy himself that is now talking—the baron called to see me, and satisfied me of the truth of his assertions. Together we went out to look for these private detectives who were going to dishonor my wife. I had with me a revolver, and I was determined to put a hole through whoever I found doing me this great injury. I found no one, although I acquired further proof implicating an agent named Vandal as the one who had been employed by Mme. Le Normand. About midday I returned home, but my wife was missing. Uneasy and alarmed, I questioned the servants. Madame had armed herself with a revolver and had gone to the Rue Colisee to kill Mme. Le Normand. I perfectly understand the resentment of my wife, and I cannot but find that she is excusable for having taken this step. She is a virtuous woman and mother of a family. She has been calumniated and her name dragged in the mud by these infamous agencies that are protected by the police. She has no adequate means of defense, for we are poor and Mme. Le Normand has millions. I had myself intended to shoot Vandal or one of his agents, who were only the paid instruments of this woman. My wife had certainly acted wiser than I in going at once to the fountain head of the calumny. When I reached the office of the commissary I learned that my wife had been arrested and brought there, but was at once released on her promise to return at 2 o'clock.

Mme. Clovis Hugues, who was present at the interview between her husband and the Baron de la Pleze, after their departure, armed herself with a revolver and started gunning for Mme. Le Normand. On reaching the house, she rapidly crossed the room that precedes the bedchamber, in which she was told Mme. Le Normand was lying ill. As she placed her hand on the latch knob, the door opened and she was confronted by M. Osmont du Tillet, the son of Mme. Le Normand, and a nun, who prevented her from entering, closing the door behind them; the former declaring that his mother was in a dying condition and could not see anybody. Pushing past M. du Tillet, she succeeded in getting the door of the bed-room partly open; but, with the assistance of the nun, he succeeded in pushing her back. At this point two policemen, who had been sent for, made their appearance. Mme. Clovis Hugues made another attempt to enter the bed-room, and in the struggle the revolver she had hid under her clothes fell on the floor and was picked up by the officers, who finally forced her to leave the house and to accompany them to the office of the commissary of police.

M. Clovis Hugues has been in politics ever since his youth, when he conspired with Blanqui against the empire. He was one of those who, in 1871, attempted to extend the commune to Marseilles, and is looked upon as the leading man of Southern France. His oratory is of a somewhat flowery style that always commands the attention of the audience; and he is a wonderful man at public meetings, where he can sway a crowd backward or forward at will, allowing no interruptions, cheers or groans to stop the flow of his rhetoric. There never was a more typical Frenchman of the South than the deputy from Marseilles; and though it would be difficult to conceive anybody less fit to become a statesman, he might become a very efficient party leader. His ideas are all generous and artistic, and his writings are as elegant as he is himself in personal appearance the very reverse. Before his election to the chamber he was for some time on the staff of La Jeune Republique of Marseilles, and since his arrival in the capital has written for L'Homme Libre, the last paper founded by Louis Blanc; for La Lanterne, and for Henri Rochefort's Intransigeant. He is also a poet of no mean order, though his muse follows the same bent as his political opinions, and is of a decidedly socialistic order. He fought a duel five years ago at Marseilles with an officer, who had spoken lightly of Mme. Clovis Hugues, and killed his opponent outright. A trial for murder followed, which ended in his acquittal by the jury. Mme. Clovis Hugues—Ma Jeanne, as her husband loves to call her—thoroughly looks the part she is playing. She is brave and resolute, almost to rashness, with an energetic face, a tall figure, dark hair and still darker eyes. She is about thirty-five years of age, and her features are of a Roman cast and regular and well shaped. She, like her husband, is a Southerner. Her father, M. Royannez, is an old journalist and staunch republican, the author of several plays of a tragic order. M. and Mme. Clovis Hugues have two children, both daughters—one named Marianne (the name generally given to the republic); the other Mireille, after the heroine of the greatest poet of the South of France. The poet dedicates all his works to his wife—"Sa Jeanne, la grande bien-aime"—and his wife enters into all his work, political and literary, and sings the children to sleep with revolutionary songs. When Clovis Hugues got locked up for writing violent attacks against the government, Mme. Hugues used to come to see him with prohibited books in her skirt, and bags of tobacco concealed in her hair.

J. H. HAYNIE.

A Peculiar Editor.

Edwin Cowles of Cleveland, who is billed to fight a duel with another Ohio editor, is an odd character, whose hobby is a hatred of the Roman Catholic church. He goes to Washington every winter to exercise it on the national course. Its sharp edges are always sticking out in some funny way. Last winter when he was there he accidentally met in a newspaper office a boxer named Collins. While both were waiting for a newspaper man, Collins talked a good deal about the manly art, and finally Cowles, who was a boxer in his youth, suggested that they while away a quarter of an hour with the gloves, then reposing on the mantel. Nothing loath, Collins assented. Cowles took off his coat and was just about to put on the gloves when a thought struck him. "Mr. Collins," he said, "are you a Catholic?" "No," said Collins. "Ah, excuse me," said Cowles; "something in your name struck me. Then let us proceed." I suppose he would have taken the gloves off and put his coat on had Collins admitted that he was a Roman Catholic.

COMPANIONS.

Smile farewell to Sorrow;
Give to Joy good-morrow,
And charge him to continue
A quiet reign within you.

Smile farewell to Gladness;
Take the hand of Sadness,
And wistfully beseech her
To be your tender teacher.

So shall both befriend you,
And to the grave attend you;
There Sorrow from you sever;
Joy go with you ever.

FISTIC PHILOSOPHY.

Talk With a Man Who Can Whip any Other Man in America.

"Do I think Paddy Ryan a game man?" said Mr. John L. Sullivan, as he stood among fifty of the fancy, including Billy Madden, Pete McCoy and Parson Davies, in Mike McDonald's store this afternoon. "Of course I do. No man ever yet took off his shirt to fight in a ring unless he was a game man, for he knows very well what he is going to get."

"Some of the newspapers said that Ryan looked terror-stricken as soon as he laid eyes on you. Is that true?"

"Not at all. Ryan did very well until I struck him once or twice, and after that he was dazed—I may say about half crazy."

"Is it true there was not a body blow struck during the whole fight?"

"Yes, that is a fact; there wasn't one."

"Do you think Ryan's nose is broken?"

"I do not; it was that blow in the nose that split his lip, and knocked him down, but I don't think it broke his nose."

"Some of the newspapers represent that Ryan was whipped by being knocked out of his senses until after time was called by your last blow, and that blow was delivered on the neck; is that true?"

"No; that is a mistake. On the last round I fought him down, and he fell in a heap from a succession of blows on his head, not from any particular one. His strength was overcome and exhausted."

"How did you feel when Ryan struck you that blow on the left eye?"

"He didn't strike me there with his fist; that black eye came from his falling toward me from weakness, and striking me with his head; in fact, he struck me no blows on the face. His blows all fell on the back of my head, which was much better for me."

"Did you part on good terms?"

"Oh, yes, we shook hands pleasantly at parting."

"Are you thinking of another match yet?"

"No, not yet. I don't mean to be a prize-fighter more than a year or two more."

"Do you think a man is apt to get killed in the ring?"

"No, I do not. I think whenever men are killed in the prize ring it is in consequence of their having something the matter with them—like heart disease."

"Have you scruples of conscience about fighting?"

"I have not. I never fight a man to kill him; I fight him only to lick him."

"Doesn't it generate a great feeling of hatred?"

"Not at all. Sometimes, when it is in dispute which is the better man, bad feeling springs up, but there is no bad feeling in a fight, or after it."

Billy Madden is considerably proud of his protege, and he said he would match Sullivan with gloves against any living man without gloves. He says speculators are trying to work up another match, but he doesn't know a living man in America, England or Australia, who would be likely to fight Sullivan. He says Ryan said when Sullivan first struck him he thought a telegraph pole had been shoved against him endwise. No one would ever guess, from his appearance, that he had "been" through a mill within a week. He is slightly yellow under the left eye, and there is a speck of bloodshot in the eye, and there is a small gash on the first knuckle of the left hand, which came in contact with one of Ryan's teeth, but with those exceptions he appears to be in the flower of health and spirits.

The Albany Whist Club.

From the New York Mail and Express.

The Whist Club of Albany is an institution of model order and propriety. It is 3 years old, and is presided over by General Rathbone, who this year succeeded Judge Parker, who was for two years president of the club. A lady member acts as secretary and treasurer, and keeps an account of all the games played. It commences its meetings at 8 o'clock, closes them at 10, and no game can be commenced after the clock strikes 10. Each member wears a badge, and has to be present punctually ten mintes before the hour. There are fines for absence, an initiation fee of $1 at the entrance, and a purse for the best player at the end of the season. Every one who cannot be present has to report the fact by 10 a. m. on the day and at the place of meeting, which is always at one of the family homes of the members of the club, in time to find a substitute for the vacant place. The entertainment which follows the games forbid an extravagance, and all betting at the tables, so that none are kept away by the excess or follies of the table or at play. Whist clubs like this are examples of reasonable and intelligent pleasure, but we fear there are not very many of them in the country.

Attar of Roses.

In the war plains of Turkey, south of the Balkan mountains, whole districts are covered with rose plants, set in lines about five feet apart, and tended for some years with the greatest care. At length, on some fresh, sweet morning of early summer, while the roses are yet wet with dew, the tender flowers are torn off by the laborers, and cast at once by heaps into huge coppers, there to boil for hours in clean rain water. The fragrant stream is carried along a tube, and on cooling becomes a kind of thick rose water. This is boiled up again, and its vapor cooled into a liquid, on the top of which floats a yellowish, oily scum that is known as "attar of roses." It takes about 4,000 pounds of roses to make one pound of attar. Once a merchant opened a cupboard in his store, and showed a visitor thirty glass bottles, in which, he said, was $60,000 worth of the precious essence. This quantity must have taken nearly 1,000,000 pounds of roses in making. But maybe, after all, their fragrance in that form would give more and longer lasting pleasure than could have been given by the flowers had they been left upon their bushes, where they would have cheered only the passer-by.

Across France in Winter Time.

J. R. G. Hassard, New York Tribune Letter.

To diffusive and extravagant Americans the most striking features of the country are the compactness of the inhabitations and the extreme economy—I may almost say the parsimony—of the method of tillage. Every square foot of ground is put to use; has been in use for unnumbred generations. Here and there in the distance appear patches of wood, carefully preserved and guarded, but the rest of the land is almost bare of shade. There is no brush or tangle of weed and wild flower by the roadside, or thicket by the stream. The last of these trespassers were eradicated ages ago, along with the last stump. A gray stone wall borders the highway. The cross-roads are often sunk two or three feet below the general level. Narrow ridges of earth mark the boundaries of the fields, and the furrows are driven so close to them that it is a wonder how the plow is turned. Single rows of poplars stretch with exasperating regularity across the landscape. They are trimmed close, and sometimes every twig is removed except a bunch at the extreme top; then they look like liberty poles with bushes tied to them. There are willows by the brook, but there are pollard-willows, kept for their twigs, which are scrupulously cut off and they lift their scarred and knotted trunks, like hands from which all the fingers have been amputated. One beauty of the country is in its fertility and the varied contour of the ground; but the traveler who looks upon it can not help longing for a little of nature's luxuriant irregularity, and thinking how much more lovely the meadow would be if a clump of alders grew by the water and a maze of clematis and blind-weed covered the boundary wall. We passed a village built in terraces upon a ridge of limestone. The rock under the houses was perforated with caverns closed by wooden doors and used apparently as stables or store-rooms.

CROOKSTON, - MINNESOTA.

In some parts of the country, some very good people, no doubt, but very foolish, for all that, are forming secret organizations to secure the overthrow of polygamy. Nothing is to be gained by secrecy, either in aims or methods.

The great Union and Central Pacific magnates have engaged rooms at Washington this winter and rumors has it that they will seek important legislation for their own benefit, or to prevent legislation for the benefit of the public.

A man recently died in New York leaving an estate of $20,000, and his will is now being contested by thirty-nine alleged heirs. It is getting to be a rare thing for a rich widower or bachelor to die in New York, where from one to a half-dozen women do not put in claims to his property on the ground that some time or another they held the tender relations of wife to the deceased. Men who enjoyed unblemished reputations, and with good reasons, after death are assailed with what would be likely to blast their names forever, were it not the offering of perjury and crime.

The Myers-Vermilye scandal is the great topic in the "society" circles of St. Paul. Mr. Vermilye alleges that Gen. Meyers, U. S. A. seduced Mrs. Vermilye, and of course the the crimenated parties deny the impeachments. Until the trial but little can be really known of the affair. Its interest is almost wholly in the fact that the parties were (to use the words of flunkey reporters) "among the elite of the refined society of St. Paul." Had they been less prominently connected with what is snobbishly called a "society" the affair would not have made such a stir.

There are nearly two hundred nail mills in the country and more being built, but that is no sign that the country is going to be well supplied with nails. When the consolidated nail makers' association discover that there is a demand for nails, and that the people must have them, they call a meeting at Pittsburg and order a shut down of the mills and a re-establishment of card rates on higher basis. This thing is done over and over again, and so often as to become monotonous. In the opinion of some people any combination is legitimate and lawful save a union of people to obtain living wages. That is socialism and communism.

From the report of Gen. Merritt superintendent of the West Point military academy, it appears that on the 1st of September, 1883, there were at the academy 55 professors and commissioned officers, and 311 cadets. There were 271 cadets at the same date of the previous year. There were no deaths during the year among the cadets, officers or soldiers. The percentage of sick to the command is one-fifth of one per cent. During the year the usual practical instruction in the three arms of the service has been given, with as good results as ever obtained before. The discipline has been good, and with the exception of a very few cadets in each class, the members of the corps are very attentive to regulations. For the half year ending May 31st, 1883, nearly one-half of the cadets had no demerits recorded against them. Cadets have been held to a strict accountability for all violations of the regulations, and uniform punishments have been fixed for the more serious neglects and unmilitary conduct.

The New York Independent has a carefully prepared article, tending to show that the current assertions of the decadence of Christianity in America are groundless. According to these statistics, which embrace a tabular exhibit of the churches, pastors and communicants in the various religious bodies, for whose completeness and substantial accuracy the Independent vouches, we have over seventeen and a quarter millions of communicants in a total population of about 50,000,000. Or, subtracting the Catholic population, there are, in round numbers, 10,500,000 Protestant communicants. Three children and adherents to each communicant is a moderate ratio. On this basis, the Protestant population is 42,000,000, and, adding the Catholics, the total Christian population is 48,332,000, leaving the Jews, Mormons and other classes, besides the non-religious, to make up the balance of about 1,000,000. The Independent estimates that the churches raise for the one item for the support of their ministers not less than $41,000,000 annually, but does not venture to estimate the amounts raised for running expenses, repairs, new churches and benevolences. It points, however, to the figures which are accessible and are summarized above as evidence that it is too soon to write of the "decline and fall" of American Christianity.

Considerable discontent has been aroused among the people of Manitoba by the course of the Canadian Government toward them, and an agitation has been inaugurated in favor of secession from the Dominion Confederation. Scores of abuses are cited by the leaders in the movement, but the following from an interview with one of them will suffice to show the situation of affairs: "Our lands are given to railroad and colonization companies; our mines are given to people who do not belong to the country, and our timber limits are leased to enrich men who at some time have done service to the Dominion Government. The opening of the Hudson Bay route is opposed, high tariffs are crushing the settlers and everything is done to keep us subservient to the central government." There is a good deal of truth in the above statement, but it would not have been thought of but for the almost utter stagnation that prevails in Manitoba. The boom has entirely collapsed and left many people in a suffering condition. Those who thought they were rich eighteen months ago are almost penniless, and not a few are living on the bounty of their friends at home or in Canada. Wild lands and unimproved lots that brought fabulous prices are now almost worthless. In the midst of this distress it is not surprising that the government is made a scape-goat.

British Treatment of American Actors.

Joseph Arthur, a theatrical manager, tells the Washington Republican that no American actor or play has succeeded in London. He, himself, went over three times with first-class attractions, and the only money he made was two shillings matching pennies with John T. Raymond in the Strand. He thinks there is a strong prejudice in the minds of Englishmen against American actors, and is inclined to rebuke the toadyism with which we swallow everything that comes to us from over the water. Mr. Arthur says:

Our greatest actor Booth, failed, and bankrupted Walter Cooch of the Princess's theatre. The mental trouble he afterward had was to that attributed. Booth never had recognition as the great artist he is until Henry Irving took him into his stock company. Our best comedian, John T. Raymond, failed. They wouldn't laugh at Col. Sellers; thought "the candle in the stove" and "scene" stupid. Frank Mayo and his stuffed wolves was jeered and guyed, or "chaffed," as they term it. Cyrile Searle's realism was too much for the audience when, as bloody Bill Sykes, he slew unhappy Nancy (Rose Eytinge). The audience exclaimed, "Oh!" "Oh!" when Baker and Farron appeared, and many held newspapers before their faces and read while Stuart Robson was "on." I was informed that bonfires were lighted all over the country when John Stevens left for home, his life only being spared on promise not to come again. Fanny Davenport was outlawed by an aristocratic bill poster, whom Price, her husband, had antagonized. Drury Lane was the altar upon which the hopes of poor John McCullough were sacrificed. Lillian Russell failed, and the vast "Her Majesty's theatre" swallowed the Haverly and his American profits. Also the coming maze of American wit, which was too good for English audiences. Yes, sir, they exalt their dislike of American stars to the level of dogmatism. It extends from the aristocratic patron to the lowest attache of the theatre, and the lord chamberlain, who, when he heard an American play was to be produced, at first refused a license, not because the conditions were not fulfilled, but because it was "American trash."

The Washington Woman Lawyer.

Washington, Special: The case of Belva Lockwood, the female lawyer charged with committing frauds on pensioners, was taken before the grand jury of the Districts today. It seems that the report that the charges against her had been withdrawn was a mistake. Secretary Teller, on the other hand, after investigation sent it to the attorney general with the recommendation that it be presented to the grand jury, and Col. Corkhill was directed to take the usual steps. The charges are that in one case Mrs. Lockwood failed to account for $60 of the pension drawn for a soldier on a power of attorney, and in another case for $305 obtained in the same way.

Railroad and River News.

In the case of John J. Green, vs. the Minneapolis & St. Louis railroad, the Minnesota supreme court has rendered an opinion to the effect that if one employe gives notice of defects in the stock to his employers, who thereupon promise that they shall be remedied, he may recover damages for injuries sustained before the expiration of the time during which defects were to be remedied, providing that the danger did not seem immediate. A railroad company is not relieved from the charge of negligence in sending an employe with a defective engine simply because it did not have time sufficient after notice of the defect to repair it, and had no other engine in proper condition to send out.

Herman Haupt has been elected president of the Dakota & Great Southern, or as it is more familiarly known, the Tower City road. At present ninety-eight miles of the road are completed or under construction. Locating engineers are now at work on the remainder of the road, and expect to complete their work by the 1st of December. The company expects to finish the line from Tower City, on the Northern Pacific to a connection with the Illinois Central, either at Sioux City or Lemars, during the coming season. It also expects to build a part of the line between Tower City and Grand Forks.

At Minneapolis the jury in the case of Thomas Howard against the St. Paul, Minneapolis & Manitoba Railroad company returned a verdict giving plaintiff $8,000 damages. The amount sued for was $20,000. A stay of proceedings was granted for thirty days.

The Criminal Record.

Bernard Boland, sentenced to the Massachusetts State Prison for life in 1873, was pardoned by the governor and council. Boland in 1863, when barely fifteen years of age, went into a store to tap the till, and was seized by an employee; whom Boland stabbed in the arm cutting an artery, which resulted in death. Boland was found guilty of murder in the second degree. It is just discovered by his friends that the statutes provide that no person under sixteen years old shall be sent to State prison, and that the boy should have been charged with manslaughter. Pardon is the result.

Pat White, a notorious young outlaw of Waukesha, Wis., was arrested for placing an obstruction on the St. Paul railroad track. White was caught in the act of placing a large heavily ironed barrel on the track about a hundred yards from the depot, at night, and admits the offense. He explains his crime by claiming that he was drugged. White was discharged from the employ of the St. Paul company, by whom he was engaged as a brakeman.

Reported Loss of the steamer Manistee.

Duluth Special: There seems to be little doubt in the minds of marine men that the propeller Manistee, with probably all on board, is lost. John Flynn, agent of the propeller line, received a telegram recently from the tug Mathew, at Ontonagon. The Manistee left Duluth on the 10th inst., for Houghton; stayed at Bayfield on the 18th, 19th, 20th, 21st and 22d inst, during the storm and left that place at midnight of the 22d for Houghton, after transferring all her passengers to the City of Duluth so she had no one on board but the crew. It is supposed that she foundered in the severe storm of the 16th, wind northeast, below zero. There has been no further news from her. The crew consisted of about twenty-five men so far as known, as follows:

Capt. John McKay, Buffalo, who leaves a wife and one child; Purser George M. Seaton, Chicago, wife and two children; Steward F. M. Kilby, Buffalo, wife; Mates, Andy Mack, Buffalo, no family, and Harry Scott, Duluth; Engineers, Pat Cullen, Buffalo, family, and John Howland; porter, John Paine; cook, Ed Boden. The Manistee was an old rotten craft like the Alpena which foundered in Lake Michigan, but had a popular captain and therefore was a favorite with tourists.

EMMETS'S IMITATOR.

A Fenian Convicted of Murder in Dublin Makes a Sensational Speech.

London Special, 24th: Dublin this morning was a city of excitement over the unexpected result of the second trial of Joseph Poole for the murder of John Kenny. The sensational scene in court which followed the conviction and sentence was fully reported in extra editions of the evening papers, which were issued in rapid succession and had a very large sale among the thousands of excited people by whom the streets were thronged. As the various details of the scene in court became known to the crowd, being read aloud in many cases to little groups of people who were unable to read for themselves, the excitement became intense, and many men and women sobbed aloud and in other ways gave vent to their emotion. When the prison van containing the condemned man was driven from the court house, it was quickly surrounded and followed to the doors of Kilmainham jail by a vast concourse of waiting people. If any fears for a rescue had been entertained, however, they were at once rendered impracticable by the strength of the mounted guard which escorted the van, and the demonstration of the crowd was confined to lamentations. The scene in the court room during the afternoon was intensely dramatic. On hearing the verdict Poole turned deathly pale, but otherwise appeared unmoved. When asked by Justice Murphy if he had anything to say why sentence of death should not be passed upon him, Poole was silent for a moment. Then rising to his full height, he began a speech which had evidently been intended as a set oration. He spoke loudly and steadily, and the breathless silence of the crowded court room, and it was evident that Justice Murphy, as well as all the others within reach of his voice, were deeply affected. There was not a quiver in the prisoner's voice until his aged father, who was among the spectators began to moan, "Oh, Joe! Joe!" Poole's voice faltered then, but he called out, "Keep up, father, keep up!" After bidding farewell to his countrymen and charging conspiracy against the prosecutors, especially his brother-in-law Lamie, the informer and Mallon, the detective, Poole shouted out "Three cheers for the Irish republic!" and "To hell with British tyranny."

The murder of John Kenny took place on July 4, 1882, in Seville Place, Dublin He was killed because he was suspected of giving information concerning the assassination of Lord Frederick Cavendish and under Secretary Burke. Kenny had been previously fired at by Fenians, as an informer. Joseph Poole and two others were arrested shortly after, and Poole was held for trial, while the other two were discharged. At the first trial of Kenny the jury disagreed

Sergeant Mason Pardoned.

Washington, Special. The president today pardoned Sergeant John A. Mason, of Battery H, Second artillery, U S A., sentenced to imprisonment for eight years in the Albany penitentiary for attempting to murder the assassin Guiteau. Mason was tried before a general court martial at the arsenal in this city in November, 1881, the president of the court being Lieut. Col. Mizner, of the Tenth infantry, and was sentenced to be dishonorably discharged from the service, with forfeiture of all pay and allowance due or to become due, and imprisonment as above stated. With large subscriptions for the benefit of his family were united numerous petitions to the president for the complete pardon of Mason and his restoration to the army. These petitions were brought in large numbers from every section of the country.

The whole number of signatures to the petitions was more than 2,000,000. Mason's family, comprising "Betty and the baby," are now living in Glendale, Orange county. Va., in comparative independence from the amounts that were subscribed throughout the country for their maintenance after Mason was sent to prison. While Mason's offense is looked upon as one of the highest of military crimes, that of a sworn guard attacking a defenseless prisoner, most military men sympathize with him, and feel that he has had sufficient punishment for his crime.

Gov. Butler Revokes a Requisition.

Gov. Butler has revoked the warrant for extradition in the case of James J. Brisben, the alleged defaulter to Senator Sabin's car company. The grounds were that the evidence did not show that the crime charged had been committed in Minnesota, and that the prosecutors, when they had him under control of an Iowa court, for a consideration allowed him to go to Ohio to attempt to arrange a settlement. "This journey," says Gov Butler, accompanied by the company's agent, whose expenses Brisben was having, hardly seems to me to be a fleeing from the justice of Iowa; and a fortiori not a fleeing from the justice of Minnesota. In addition to this, I am not convinced, as I ought to be, affirmatively, that this process of extradition is not sought still for the purpose of the collection of a civil debt. If so, it would be an abuse of the constitutional provision for the extradition of citizens of one state to another, and so it has always been held. Seriously doubting on this point, I should not feel authorised to issue a warrant for extradition having been issued, however, when the whole facts were not known, and without any hearing of the alleged fugitive from justice, that warrant is hereby revoked."

New Surgeon General of the Army.

The president has appointed Col. Robert Murray, surgeon U. S. A., to be surgeon general, vice Crane deceased. Col. Murray entered the army in 1846, and ranks next below J. H. Baxter, chief medical purveyor. Col. Murray is now chief medical officer on the staff of Maj. Gen. Hancock. No promotion will be made to assistant surgeon general until Col. Murray is confirmed. Robert Murray was commissioned assistant surgeon June 29, 1846, from Maryland; was promoted to captain June 29, 1851; to be major and surgeon June 28, 186 ; lieutenant colonel and medical purveyor July 28, 1866; to be colonel and surgeon June 26, 1876 receiving a brevet of that rank March 13, 1865. He ranked next below Col. Baxter, medical purveyor, whose commission as colonel dated from June 23, 1874.

A Sensible Statesman.

An anti-Mormon movement has been started in England. Efforts are being made to prevent the working of Mormon influence among the people. Mr. Gladstone, being asked to interfere in the matter, said that, while realizing the importance of the question, he was unable to take any active steps in favor of the desired end, owing to the fact that the missionaries resorted to no illegal devices to obtain proselytes. He suggested, however, that an improvement in the condition of the laboring classes would do more to nullify the influence of Mormonism than any legislation that could be devised.

Murdered For Money.

Jackson, Mich., Nov. 22—This morning four persons, Jacob D. Crouch, aged seventy-four, widower; Henry White, aged thirty-eight, son-in-law of Crouch; Eunice White, aged thirty-three, daughter of Crouch, all of Summit township, Jackson county, and Moses Polley, aged twenty-six, of Transfer, Mercer, county, Pa., were found murdered in their beds, all having been shot through the head behind the ear. It is supposed they were chloroformed first, as no signs of a struggle appeared, each victim lying as if asleep and an odor of chloroform being noticeable when the bodies were discovered. Mrs. White was also shot through the left arm. No clue has been discovered, although tracks around the house indicate that a guard was placed around the house while the murder was being perpetrated. Crouch was a wealthy farmer living seven miles southwest of Jackson and the owner of an extensive sheep ranch in Texas. It is rumored that he had just received about $50,000 from Texas, in payment of sales made on his ranch. Bankers here state that no money was deposited by Crouch, and it is presumed that the money was in Crouch's hands. Polley was stopping at Crouch's, having just come from Texas with a large amount of money for the purpose of buying blooded stock. The theory is that he (Polley) was followed from Texas by the murderers for the purpose of robbery. The house was thoroughly ransacked and everything of value carried away. A young girl, adopted daughter of the Whites, and a negro, aged eighteen, were sleeping up stairs. They say they heard no firing although the negro says he heard a thumping noise about the middle of the night and thought it was caused by a fierce wind that was blowing. Mrs White expected to become a mother in a week or ten days. The murder has caused intense excitement and hundreds of people flocked to the horrible scene. The officers are very quiet upon the subject, but hard at work trying to get a clue to proceed upon. The young negro, Boles was arrested and jailed to await the result of the coroner's inquest. Crouch was worth about $2,000,000 in property in Jackson county, and sheep ranches in Texas, near Fort Worth. He leaves two sons and one daughter. A pocketbook containing $105 and a certificate of deposit for $500 was found in a window in White's room. An empty cartridge box, 32 calibre was found in the negro, Boles' room.

A Very Bad Badger.

In the circuit court at Stevens Point Frank Riant was found guilty of committing rape upon the person of an old lady seventy-two years of age, named Jane Gatchy at Jdleson, Wis., June 26, 1882. The case has attracted a great deal of attention on account of the age of the plaintiff. The testimony went to show that Riant followed the old lady on her way home, which was through a piece of woods, and committed the assault. The defendant made a general denial, that he was not in the vicinity at the time, but his own witnesses contradicted his statement. Riant is a hard character, having served a term in Waupun, and committed this rape within four months after being released from Waupun.

A Western Man's Presentiment.

Silver Plume (Col.) Correspondence.

"Do I believe in presentiments? Well, you can bet I do! I'll relate some of my experiences, and then you may see something in it too."

The above was part of the conversation I had a short time ago with an old frontiersman named George W. Packard. The following is just as he related his experience to me.

I am a native of Ohio, but came west in 1853, and entered the employ of the Overland Express company as station agent, my post being in Utah, my duty being the care of relays of stock.

One evening just as twilight was gathering, the day expressman having changed horses and gone. I ate my supper, then brought my stock in, which consisted of two ponies and two mules. After "hobbling" them securely. I "picketed" them in a circle about where I intended to lie down, near the trail, as was my custom, so that I might hear the next passenger, should he chance along before daybreak, and also hear any disturbance of my stock. This being done, I wrapped myself in blankets and lay down on my "ready made" bed (the bare ground). Around me all was still as death, save the movements of my stock and the rustling of the branches of the rank sage brush, which in that country grows to the height of three or four feet.

Above me the stars shone out in all the brightness this western country can show. But sleep would not come this night try as I might. I lay during what seemed hours to me, yet I could not sleep. Presently my stock seemed fretful, just as they would do when a storm was coming on. Again and again I tried to sleep, until a dread came over me, from which I became quite nervous. I arose, taking my rifle, and went all around for 200 or 300 feet, but not a living thing could I see or hear. The stillness was not broken even by a coyote's howl. So I went back, and, wrapping my blanket about me, I lay down again, laughing at my nervousness, determined to sleep; but instead of sleep a feeling took possession of me such as I cannot describe. Something seemed to be tugging at me and drawing me toward my stock, which still seemed fretful. I loosened their lariats and led them, as the impulse led me, into the sage brush some distance from the trail, all the while calling myself a coward, and using all my will power to overcome the strange feeling which seemed to possess me; yet I picketed my stock, went back and removed my entire outfit to my new quarters.

Then again lying down, intending to sleep, a feeling of satisfaction seemed to replace the dread which had so controlled me. I lay there only a few minutes thinking of what the expressman would think of me in case he came through before daylight, when the air was rent by the most hideous yells that ever escaped from the lips of a redskin. I crawled out from my stock, and looking out from the brush, could faintly see the outlines of a dozen Arapahoes. They had found the clearing where I had been in camp, and finding my fire out and everything deserted, they left, after looking around in some of the brush, at times being close enough to me to have shot them with my pistols. Imagine my feelings as they struck off the trail west. My "lucky star" shone that night surely.

Daylight came at last, but no expressmen yet. I waited until half the forenoon was gone, when I became alarmed for his safety. With more or less fear, yet knowing my duty, I mounted my pony and started west on trail to see if he was in sight. I rode on for about ten miles when my pony gave a snort. All at once the truth flashed upon me. The red devils had met and murdered him. Riding a little further I came upon his body lying in the trail, scalped, robbed and mutilated horribly by their tomahawks, and his pony lying dead at his side.

"Lucky star," "luck," "presentiment," call it what you may. It was just that something which saved my scalp that night and I don't forget it.

Mr. Hoppin, Secretary of the American Legation at London, is said to enjoy more popularity than any one who has filled the position since the days of Mr. Benjamin Moran.

BIENNAL ELECTIONS AFTER 1884.

Section 5, Article 5, of the State Constitution Amended so that Biennal Elections Will be Legal, by a Vote of 74,375 to 24,359.

From the Pioneer Press 24th.

The official canvass of the votes on the amendment to Sec. 5, Art. 5, of the constitution took place yesterday afternoon at the office of the secretary of state, in the presence of the governor, attorney general, state auditor, secretary of state, and Chief Justice Gilfillan. The canvass was completed in a little more than an hour and showed the amendment to be carried by a majority of 50,016 votes. This amendment is the one which adds a section to Art. V., providing that after November, 1884, State elections shall be held biennially. The vote on the other amendments will be canvassed in the early part of January, special enactments providing for yesterday's count on the special section referred to. The vote by counties was as follows:

Articles have been filed amending the articles of incorporation of the Dassel elevator company of Dassel, Meeker county, so that in annual elections each share shall have one vote only hereafter instead of each member.

A meeting of the wool growers of Olmstead county has been called to meet in Chadburn's hall on Dec. 8 next, for the purpose of organizing a wool growers' association. The sheep raising industry is now becoming so large and valuable in that section that need is felt of some permanent and influential organization.

T. J. McInerny of Maple Lake is charged with selling a forged $100 school bond in Wright county.

B. F. Mickall, a prominent citizen of Moorhead, narrowly escaped death from asphyxiation from coal gas.

The convention of school superintendents will be held at the state capitol at St. Paul Friday, Dec. 28. Arrangements have been made with all the railroads, so that return rates of one-fifth the regular fare will be offered. These reduced rates will also be given those attending the State teachers' convention at Minneapolis.

James Clint was killed at Breckinridge, Minn., by being run over while coupling cars.

Ben Anushinisky of Lanesboro made an assignment recently. Liabilities, $5,000. He formerly did a large business at Preston. He went to St. Paul, started a branch at Wells, was burned out, and has had hard luck ever since.

Hon. A. H. Bullis of Winnebago City has lost several head of valuable cattle with black leg.

Louis LaValle, a respected citizen of Centerville, has not been seen since leaving a neighbor's house one day last week, although diligent search has been made. He was in poor health, but there is no suspicion of foul play.

George White has been arrested and held for trial on a charge of burglarizing the store of Potter & Willard, at Aitkin, and taking goods to the amount of $100.

William H. Bond, an old and well-known resident of Stockton died recently.

George Cook of Tenhassen, Martin county, Minn., was thrown from a wagon by a runaway team and killed.

Sheriff Larcom of Clay County died at Moorhead. Coroner Czizek will succeed to the office until the county commissioners select a successor.

H. Holderman, one of the most influential and wealthy Norwegians of Dodge county went to Kasson the 23d inst, and drank hard until late in the afternoon. About 8 p. m. he started for home, ten miles south. He had not gone more than half a mile when he fell from his wagon, and his neck was broken. He was soon brought into town and the body is waiting an inquest. Upon his person was found about $340 in cash, a watch and some other articles. He leaves two children.

Susanna Ranuyak comes all the way from Hungary to Minneapolis to find her husband John in possession of another wife.

Herman Trousich a life prisoner at the penitentiary at Stillwater died recently of consumption, and was buried in Fairview cemetery. The deceased was sent from Wright county two years ago for murder. He was twenty-eight years of age and leaves a wife and family at Dayton, Hennepin county.

Miss Margaret King, daughter of Ex-Sheriff King of St. Paul was married on the 29th to Arthur A. Rogers.

Articles of incorporation of the Minnesota Loan & Debenture company have been filed with a capital stock of $3,000,000, in 30,000 shares of $100 each, and a limit of liability fixed at the amount of the capital stock. The business is to be principally transacted in St. Paul, and the company to endure thirty years from Dec 1. The incorporators are J. C. Bull, Lemars Iowa; R. H. Benson, Sibley, Iowa, J. H. Swan, Sioux City, Iowa, R. C. Wright, P. M. Clark, St. Paul. These gentlemen constitute the board of directors. As the name of the company indicates, its purpose is to loan money on proper securities.

A Wisconsin Woman Confesses.

Dartford, Wis., Special: At 9 o'clock on the morning of the 24th, Mrs. Ellen Long confessed to the murder of Harvey Whittlemore. She cut his throat at 11:15 on the morning of the day he disappeared, and carried the body to the river alone the morning of the day it was found. She declares she had no confederate in the crime and refuses to reveal the motive which prompted it. She will not answer any other questions. The confession was made in her cell in the presence of the sheriff, the justice, her father and her attorney. It is thought that her father's presence has brought out the confession. He advised her by letter some time ago to confess, if she was guilty.

She insists that there was no motive for the deed, but reticence since the confession and in making it, as she had, belies the statement. The object of continuing the examination is to either prove or disprove these theories. There is much furor at Princeton over the confession, but it is believed that the guilty woman will be protected against mob violence should it be [illegible]

Frauds in Wheat and the Remedy.

Red Lake Falls Messenger.

The JOURNAL of Crookston and several other papers in the Red River Valley are vigorously denouncing the shameless frauds committed by the Millers' association agents and other wheat speculators at the expense of the farmers. The palpable steals committed under the flimsy pretenses of cockle, dirt, smut, damp, have all had their run, and now, failing to find among all these a cause for depreciating this years crop, as fine as ever vouchsafed by Providence to the tiller of the soil, they raise the new cry of "frozen wheat." A more direct, high handed attempt at robbery has never been attempted, and it is time the farmers—no, not only farmers, but that every class of men joined hands to stop it. We have been told by more than one reliable farmer of serious losses through this infamous steal, and the business men of the county must soon realize that the loss is also theirs.

An attempt to control the wheat buyers and speculators, or to prevent these frauds, by ordinary methods, will we fear prove futile. But there remain two ways, by which the machinations of this hungry horde of leeches may be overcome. Co-operation in wheat buying and shipping, and the erection of more mills. The first will be only temporary, and may not always be thoroughly satisfactory. But in the development to their fullest extent, of the almost unrivalled water powers of Red Lake River, at this point, as well as all other available powers in this region, and the manufacture of every bushel of wheat of the country close to the place of production, lies the true solution of the problem. The farmers will secure all the advantages in prices and ready market, caused by the active competition among mill men, with the mininum risk of combinations against them. The development of the wheat milling industry, will bring in its train scores of others, increasing a hundred fold the number of consumers in all our towns and villages, and by creating a demand for their products necessitate and encourage the cultivation of more variedcrops, dairying and stock raising. Thus the growth of town and country, dependent upon and aiding each other, will speedily follow the commencement and encouragement of home manufacture of home products.

Harping on and cavilling at evils that cannot be controlled is of little use. The great wheat monopolists have too firm a grip to be easily made to loosen it, and while the complaining goes on, the country suffers. Let men who understand the vital importance of the question rather turn their attention to what we have shown to be the true remedy, and by every fair means, encourage the increase on every side, of the milling industries. Develop our water powers. Form co-operative or joint stock companies, and build mills. Spread abroad with a liberal hand, among men of capital and enterprise, information in regard to the wonderful advantages of the portion of the State and induce them to secure their own while adding to our prosperity. And, as railroads we must have, to take our manufactured products by the most direct route to the world's markets, work unitedly and steadily for the development of the railroad system of the northwest, leading direct to the great lakes. Let these things once be accomplished, and the prosperity of all classes in the northwest will be assured, and complaints such as are now so rife will cease entirely.

THE WHEAT CONTROVERSY.

The Minneapolis Millers, and the Manitoba R. R. vs. The Farmers.

Red Lake Falls Gazette.

The press and people throughout the country tributary to the Manitoba railroad are raising a general and lusty howl at the low prices of wheat and the cause of the same, and well may they be displeased. The Minneapolis Millers control all the elevators along the line, and grade wheat as they like and pay what they choose, without any reference to quality or actual value. The farmers in a majority of cases are obliged to part with their grain at any price to obtain money to pay debts that have accumulated during the summer. Farmers who are not thus obliged to sell their wheat are storing it, and will hold their grain for higher prices next spring. This is making great stringency in all money matters throughout this part of the country. The Manitoba railroad is as much to blame for this state of affairs as the Millers' associations, as it has no right as a common carrier to colleague with an association that is formed for the purpose of, and does rob the farmer. If the farmers of this country will look back from one year to another, they will recollect that with each succeeding year this association has found some way, or some excuse, that would enable them to make a grand steal of each harvest. They will introduce, as the circumstances may make most plausable, the story of "smut," "damp," "frozen," or the "little brass joker." As long as they have but one outlet for their wheat, and that carrier plays into the hands of this association, so long will our farmers be obliged to submit to this treatment of them by this strong monopoly. What is the remedy? DOWN WITH MONOPOLIES! CREATE OPPOSITION.

The only practical course to follow is to get a direct outlet for our grain to the lakes. This outlet is the Duluth & Winnipeg railroad. It is the only road that will free the farmers of this Northwest from bondage. The building of this road would grant competing lines to Minneapolis and St. Paul, and would give the most direct line possible to the lakes. With the completion of this road our farmers will get nearly the same price for wheat as that paid in Chicago or Milwaukee. Is not this worth trying for? IT CERTAINLY IS. Therefore we urge the whole country tributary to this road to give it a hearty and material support, and it will be operating in time to carry their crops to the lakes next year.

Our Chicago Letter.

CHICAGO, Nov. 24, 1882.

The festive absconding bank clerk has at last come to grief. If any other city in this country has more confidential clerks "go wrong" than Chicago your correspondent don't know it; and of all the strange things in this strange city the conviction of one of these thieves wins the prize Frederick M. Ker gets ten years at Joliet for appropriating $55,000 from the funds of Preston, Kean & Co., bankers, and the community is greatly indebted to that firm for the persistence with which it followed up the thief. His prosecution is said to have cost them no less than $10,000. The usual method is to frighten the delinquent and his friends into making good at least a portion of the loss and then dropping the whole matter. The result is that clerks who are led by the influences of fast society to seek to increase their income by using employer's money in Board of Trade speculations have no dread of punishment—on the one hand is the bright but delusive hope of great winnings, on the other an entire absence of fear of suffering if detected in theft. There have been threats of attempting to implicate the brokers through whom Ker speculated. The theory being that they must have known the source of his supplies, so large was the sum of his losses. It is extremely doubtful, however, if a case could be made against them.

Flemming, the "Fund W" man, is now under arrest in Chicago for his transactions last winter while a member of the firm of Flemming & Mariam, alleged commission merchants. The scheme is well known to all your readers. It is whispered now that the firm was really acting only as a catspaw for some old-established house and that certain people of high standing are trembling least Flemming divulge all the secrets known to him in order to save himself. Right in this connection it may be remarked that a few weeks ago a certain prominent commission firm sent out a large number of circulars announcing a scheme precisely identical with the "Fund W" plan. It was a surprise to the community that so reputable a house should embark in such an enterprise. This week the firm issues another circular withdrawing its former proposals, alleging that while the business could be carried out honestly with possibly large profits, it was liable to abuse by designing men and success on their part would tend to make it still more easy for the dishonest to catch gudgeons. Whether the appearance of this second circular is in any degree the result of the "trembling" above referred to I am not able to say, probably the promulgation of the one and the attack of the other simultaneously was a mere co-incidence.

Business houses continue to go to smash though the week has not added any large failures to the already frightfully long list, and among the daily bulletin are not found more than Chicago's fair proportion. The liabilities of Cleveland, Cummings & Woodruff, the broken dry-goods house, proved to be $600,000—an increase of fifty per cent. over the first report. Most of the creditors have accepted 60 cents as a full settlement of their claims. It is surmised that the banks of this city will hardly be able to pay their usual dividends this year. They have been making money rapidly, the stock of several of them is quoted at as high as 200 per cent. The Union National had a claim of $107,000 against Cleveland, Cummings & Woodruff and is one of the creditors that has settled at 60 cents. Even so heavy an institution is hardly able to stand many such losses without flinching.

The Union League Club endeavored to banquet the Illinois delegation in Congress on Thursday evening but succeeded in reaching the stomachs of only Senator Logan and Representatives Adams, Cannon, Henderson, Finerty and Dunham—four of the six being Chicago men. The chief topic under consideration in the post-prandial talk was the Hennepin Canal project and an opinion may be safely hazarded that if there were not a perfect willingness on the part of those anxious for the success of this enterprise that the general Government should foot the banquet would not have been thought of.

Next in interest to the big politicians stand the big cattle. The fat stock show is a thing of the past and its success has been immensely gratifying to its promoters. The ability of breeders to induce a good animal to lay on fat has been demonstrated as perhaps never before. A considerable number of cattle were slaughtered, and the chief interest in the show centered in the beef on the blocks. The slaughter test places the Short-Horns first in the percentage of meat to offal, though the Herefords pushed them so closely that there is hardly a choice between the two. The show brought prominently to the front the Aberdeen-Angus cattle, and there can be no question that they are growing rapidly in favor among stock men.

A "lock out" of cigar-makers is iminent, the alleged cause being that much annoyance is occasioned manufacturers by the fact that two unions exist among the men—the members of the International Union refuse to work with those who belong to the Progressive Union. There is some dissatisfaction, too, among the men with their wages. The manufacturers think if they shut down for a time the men will be ready to go to work more contentedly. Behind all this, however, is undoubtedly the depression of trade and the fact that the market is well stocked.

We often hear of stolen kisses—Chicago's criminal record this week shows an aggravated case, burglary being a part of the charge. The facts are that a burglar, after helping himself to the cash and valuables of his host, if I may use the expression, could not resist the temptation of adding to his plunder a kiss from the lips of the seventeen-year-old daughter who lay asleep in the room through which he passed. The fair one awoke with a scream and the father rushed in just in time to fire a poorly-directed shot at the fleeing thief as he leaped through a window. Neither the burglar, the jewelry nor the kiss have been heard of since.

Fisher's Fancies.

From the Bulletin.

Jim. Bain has gone down to his claim in the thirteen townships.

Mr. and Mrs. C. B. Rockwood have gone to Indianapolis on a visit to their friends, and will not return for a month at least.

Farmers, let Wellington's cry at the battle of Waterloo be yours as against the swindling Millers' Association: "Up, guards, and at 'em"

John Steenerson is again in Fisher, after spending the last few months on his claim in the thirteen townships.

J. W. Silverthorne commenced chicken raising in the spring with a stock of seven head. He has now sixty-five, besides keeping the house in eggs all the summer. Stock raising of all kinds is the thing for farmers to turn their attention to in the face of the Miller's Association robberies.

The Steenerson Bros. lost a fine mare on Tuesday morning in consequence of her receiving a kick from a horse. Such was the force of the blow that the femur (thigh bone) was broken clear in two in the middle. A revolver was obtained and the poor creature was despatched to the happy hunting grounds.

Rev. Father Riviere collected $600 in three days for his church.

Some miscreant broke into the depot Thursday night, smashing the glass and sash in one of the windows to gain an entrance. No other damage.

"Consistency, thou art a jewel." We understand some of those who were most active in getting up the petition for abolishing Sunday trading, visited Crookston on the Sabbath quite recently and had their photographs taken. We are therefore led to believe that although it is a mortal sin to trade in Fisher on Sunday it is not so at Crookston. We have not been able to find out the names of the parties.

The Independent.

The ablest religious and literary newspaper published. One-quarter to one-half larger, but the same price as its contemporaries.

It has twenty-two distinct departments, all good, many of them of superior excellence.

Its literary department, embracing reviews, criticisms and notices of all new books published, contains 10 or 12 columns weekly, and has no superior in journalism.

During the next few months The Independent will publish stories by William D. Howells, author of "Their Wedding Journey," "A Modern Instance," etc.; W. E. MORTGAGE SALE.

DEFAULT HAVING BEEN MADE IN THE payment of the sum of four hundred eighty-one and 67-100 dollars ($481.67) which is claimed to be due at the date of this notice upon a certain mortgage duly executed and delivered by Edward O. Roark to Mary J. Moore, bearing date the 14th day of November, A. D. 1881, and with a power of sale therein contained, duly recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds in and for the county of Polk and State of Minnesota on the 15th day of November, A. D. 1881, at 10 o'clock a. m., in book "S" of mortgages, on pages 470 and 471, and no action or proceeding having been instituted at law or otherwise to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof.

Now, therefore, notice is hereby given that by virtue of the power of sale contained in said mortgage and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the premises described in and conveyed by said mortgage, viz: The northeast quarter (ne¼) of section thirty-two (32), township No. one hundred and fifty-two (152) north, of Range No. forty-four (44) west, in Polk County, Minnesota, with the hereditaments and appurtenances, which sale will be made by the Sheriff of said Polk County at the front door of the Court House in the city of Crookston in said county and State, on the 26th day of January, A. D. 1884, at 10 o'clock a. m., at public vendue to the highest bidder for cash to pay said debt and interest and taxes, if any there be, on said premises, and fifty dollars attorney's fees as stipulated by and in said mortgage in case of foreclosure, and the disbursements allowed by law, subject to redemption at any time within one year from the day of sale as provided by law.

MARY J. MOORE,
Mortgagee.

JOHN McLEAN, Atty for Mortgagee.
Dated Nov. 28, 1883. [31-37]

[First insertion Nov. 29th, 1883.]

MORTGAGE SALE.

DEFAULT HAS BEEN MADE IN THE condition of a certain mortgage, duly executed and delivered by Benjamin J. LaDuke and Mary E. LaDuke, his wife, mortgagors, to M. R. Brown, mortgagee, dated the 29th day of September, A. D. 1882, and recorded as a mortgage in the office of the Register of Deeds of the County of Polk and State of Minnesota, on the 2d day of October, A. D. 1882, at 1:30 o'clock p. m., in book "H" of mortgages, on page 299, on which there is claimed to be due at the date of this notice the amount of two hundred twenty-three 83-100 dollars ($223.83) and no action or proceeding has been instituted at law or in equity to recover the debt secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof.

The said mortgage was duly assigned by an instrument thereof, duly executed and delivered by the said M. R. Brown to Joseph Kelso, dated the 23d day of February, A. D. 1883, and recorded in said office of the Register of Deeds on the 27th day of February, A. D. 1883, at 4 o'clock p. m., in book "K" of mortgage records, on page 262.

Notice is hereby given that by virtue of a power of sale contained in said mortgage and of the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the mortgaged premises therein described, which sale will be made at the front door of the Court House, in the city of Crookston, in the County of Polk and State of Minnesota, by the Sheriff of said county, on the 26th day of January, A. D. 1884, at 10 o'clock a. m, to satisfy the amount which shall then be due on said mortgage, with the interest thereon and taxes, if any on said premises, and costs and expenses of sale, and twenty-five dollars attorney's fees as stipulated in said mortgage in case of foreclosure.

The premises described in said mortgage and so to be sold is the lot, piece or parcel of land situated in the County of Polk and State of Minnesota, and known and described as follows, to-wit: Beginning at a point fifty feet (50ft) east from the southwest corner of lot one in block forty-four (44) in townsite of Crookston, according to the recorded plat thereof now on file in the office of the Register of Deeds, thence at right angles northerly one hundred and fifty feet (150 feet) thence at right angles easterly and parallel with Sixth street fifty feet (50ft) thence at right angles southerly to the line of Sixth street one hundred and fifty feet (150ft) thence westerly along the line of Sixth street fifty feet (50ft) to the place of beginning, being 50 feet front on Sixth street by one hundred and fifty feet deep.

Polk County Journal.
OFFICIAL PAPER OF THE COUNTY.
CROOKSTON, THURSDAY, NOV. 29

TO THE PUBLIC.

At the last session of the legislature several measures were proposed for a State inspection of grain and control of warehouses and railroads, these met with strong opposition from the business interests concerned and were without exception defeated. The arguments of the railroad and warehouse representatives were chiefly based on the asserted fact that the evils aimed at by the proposed legislation did not exist, and hence to, enact the proposed laws would be an unnecessary intermeddling with private business. That in short the wisest policy would be to let well enough alone. They challenged the production of evidence showing extortion, or unjust discrimination on the part of railroads or elevator managers. Curious enough, very few specific complaints were made and very little, if any, proof offered. Now, in order to meet these arguments in the future, I would ask all persons who may have any knowledge of the abuses referred to, to make a statement of the facts, verify it by oath, and send it to me, and I will keep it on file for use at the next session of the legislature. It will not do to call elevator owners and railroad companies thieves and robbers, that does not prove anything. Let every one interested in the subject compile the necessary facts from now until January 1st, 1885, and send them to me for use before the next session of the legislature and I shall be very glad to assist in remedying all evils that may exist.

Very respectfully,
H. STEENERSON.

Pioneer Press: A. E. Johnson, of A. E. Johnson & Co., emigration agents, leaves on the noon train of the Milwaukee & St. Paul to-day for New York, indending to sail from that point in the steamship Fulda, of the North German Lloyd line, on the 28th inst. He will, while abroad, visit Hamburg, Bremen, Copenhagen, Guttenberg, Christiana and Stockholm. The trip is purely a business one, the object being to insure immigration to Minnesota from the points mentioned. Mr. Johnson was given a farewell supper last evening by members of the Scandinavian press of St. Paul and Minneapolis.

Kittson County Enterprise.

The farmers of this part of Minnesota will have to learn several important factors to insure their success. At present every man is struggling to see how many bushels of wheat he can raise, and strange as it may seem, some men are contented if they can simply get a good number of acres in grain without any regard as to how the work is done, or any prospects of a paying yield, they "slap it in" and the soil must do the rest. We would say, first cultivate your land thoroughly, plow deep, use only the best, cleanest and hardest of Scotch Fife wheat for seed, see that the seed is properly covered when put in the ground, under these conditions farming will pay if the crops are carefully harvested, threshed and sold. The ordinary farmer, when his crop has fairly started, will reason in this manner: Well, I have one hundred acres of the best wheat in the country, everybody says so and it can't help at the least yielding 20 bushels to each acre, which will be 2,000 bushels and at a dollar per bushel which will be $2,000; on the strength of this he builds a house, buys more horses or buys a large tract of land, or contracts debt in some way, feeling perfectly easy as to the payments, cheerfully giving notes, mortgages or promises to pay in the fall. Well, now a drouth comes, or an early frost nips the crop or some unseen obstacle arises which cuts the profit down so materiallythat when fall comes, instead of going around and paying for everything he has obligated himself for, is compelled to have his notes extended, and ask the merchant to wait for a good part of his money until next fall and thus a crop of dead weights are hung on to the chance of "getting out next fall."

Our advise to farmers would be, first do not overcrop yourself, this is the first fatal mistake, bad for you and worse for your teams, second: procure the very best seed, be sure that none better or cleaner can be had before you buy it, don't mind paying a little more for it, third: plow your land deep, don't throw the light sod (first cut on breaking) back on backsetting and back again on the next plowing, but go down an inch deeper each time and get some fresh soil strong to "boom" your crop, fourth: don't spend a dollar foolishly or contract debt if you can possibly help it, if your prospects are good wait and enjoy the results of your labor, don't "pluck the apple before it is ripe and it will be much pleasanter eating." In ending, this we would say, try and make as much of your living at home, keep a cow or two, a few chickens and raise all the pork your family can eat, have a yearling to kill every fall and when your wheat crop is sold you will have plenty of cash and not be pleading for more time in which to pay what you owe. Those farmers who manage to keep out of debt will eventually be well off and enjoy the results of their labor in the increased value of the land and have a comfortable home in which to spend the remainder of their life, while those who will permit themselves to drift into debt will go deeper and deeper until they loose all courage and are sold out of their home, and compelled to wander off to newer lands, and commence again, when the noon-day of their life is spent and the ambition of their mind broken. Pause and see which way you are going, take warning that it may not be your fate to see the well improved acres which you have toiled and labored to tame, pass into the hands of the stranger for debt.

From the Warren Sheaf.

In view of the fact that farmers all through the Red River Valley are being crushed and ground under the iron heel of the Millers' Association, Bro. Cooke of the POLK COUNTY JOURNAL, in commenting at length on the matter among other things says:

"Wilkin County farmers are organizing for the fight. The Wilkin County Record, in its issue of Friday, Nov. 9th, publishes a call for a convention, to be held in Breckenridge on Saturday next. The call is signed by forty-three of the prominent farmers in the different towns in the county and the object stated is to form a Farmers League, Union or Association, the object of which shall be mutual protection and benefit. Every county in the Red River Valley should have an Association of a similar nature which would result in great good. We shall watch the proceedings of the Wilkin County Farmers' Association with deep interest, and we trust that the time is not far distant till Polk County shall have a similar institution. Arise, farmers organise for the protection of your interests."

Let the good work go on say we until something like a fair compensation is allowed the tillers of the soil for their labor. This lowering the price of wheat from year to year under some pretext or another must be brought to an end or our farmers will be compelled to pull up stakes or suffer financial ruin. Are the farmers of Marshall County ready to take steps for the maintenance of their rights?

County News.

St. Hilaire Rocket.

From the Spectator.

Rev. Beebe preached his farewell sermon in this town on Sabbath last. He goes from here to Hullock, and will take charge of a new church just established at that point. Who is to succeed Mr. Beebe at this place we have not learned.

Mrs. Mix, and her two talented daughters left on Friday morning's train for Crookston, where they will spend the winter, and return here early in the spring. They will be missed in our social circles and will receive a hearty welcome upon their return.

Mr. W. S. Morse, as agent for R. C. Jones, has let the contract to Mr. L. B. King, for the cutting of 40,000 feet of logs and 200 cords of wood on Morgan's addition. The logs will be hauled to Sorsoliel & Darling's saw mill, where they will be manufactured into lumber and then sold.

Marcus Oleson arrived from the north yesterday morning at an early hour so full of bug juice that his back teeth were fairly floating, and going in to Mr. Ulen's saloon, demanded whiskey. Mr. U. politely informed him that he had already a superabundance of that delightful beverage and could get none in his place. Marcus then commenced to make things lively, and Mr. Ulen had to put him out, which he did in a highly interesting manner. This sort of treatment did not seem to suit Mr. Oleson's fastidous fancy, and he proceeded to get even by putting his fist through several of the large panes of glass in the front of Mr. Ulen's place After he had demolished three, he was arrested and tied up until he became sober, when he was taken before Judge Ives, and fined $5 and costs and also made to pay for the damage he had one.

Mr. E. A. Ransen returned from his second expedition to Thief Lake on Friday last, well loaded down with the furs of mink, rats etc., which he captured during his absence. He also shot a large moose, the skin of which he has had tanned and manufactured into moccasins. During his stay with the Indians he has thoroughly mastered the Chippewa language and now all he needs is a feather in his cap and a long pipe to make him a first-class Chippewa brave.

Mr. Hans Hendrick, the genial salesman in Fontain & Anglim's store was in these parts on Monday last holding down his claim, which by the way, is one of the best pieces of land in this part of the country. While here Mr. Hendricks invested $1,200 in another farm near his and informed us that if he had the capital he would have the inclimation to purchase every quarter section of land in this part of Polk Co. He says that in his opinion a man would be safe in investing his bottom dollar in Polk Co. farms, which shows his head is level, even though he does part his hair in the middle. Come again, Hans, and bring another little twelve hundred in your breeches pocket.

So far, Crookston has fortunately escaped the ravages of that dreaded monster the Fire Fiend, but we know not at what hour he may appear in our midst. The only way to meet this terrible foe is by good, reliable Insurance. Look over our Million List of staunch, fire-tested companies and make your selection before you have cause to regret a loss.

THE POT IS BOILING.

Elsewhere we publish two ringing articles from the Grand Forks Herald, a paper that knows what it is talking about and one too, that is not afraid to pitch into thieves and rings, and monopolies, big and little—the larger and more dangerous the thief the more delight the Herald takes in puncturing him. The JOURNAL has been fighting this Minneapolis Millers' Ring ever since that institution attempted through the excuse of "frozen wheat" to buy up the whole wheat crop at from one-third to one-half its actual value; when they commenced their steal the JOURNAL opened out upon them and several of our friends remonstrated with us on our course asking us "what good we could do?" Our answer is read in the muttering storm that is already brewing all over this valley—in the fact that every respectable, honest newspaper in the valley is urging its patrons to unite against the giant evil, to form clubs and fight the monopoly and while, in the outset we had no well defined idea of just how relief could be had and an open market obtained we knew that by constant agitation some way would yet be found to reach even this giant evil and some weapon of defense revealed. We knew that if the subject was constantly agitated, if farmers and business men were made to see and feel the enormity of the steal that was going on that a remedy would at last be found and applied. And it certainly will if farmers will but unite to protect their own interests. The Millers have accomplished a great thing. They have organized and are sustaining a giant monopoly that is robbing this country of thousands of dollars, but they never did it single-handed. No, they combined to act as one and their grinding power is felt in every household in the land. There are many ways to be found if earnestly sought after and one way, the way suggested by the Herald in one of its articles which we quote elsewhere, is a good one but can never be done without organization. Let the farmers unite, and if we have to wait until another Legislature convenes for relief, then go before that Legislature prepared to show our grievances, demand the relief that is our due and we are confident that we shall get the relief sought. The Republican party, being the party in power can regulate this matter and if it fails to do so after a proper representation of the wrongs under which we suffer then she must expect to get a black eye or two. We say, and we repeat it that there is a way to remedy this evil and it is high time to try the effects of making a political issue of it.

A correspondent of the Perham (Otter Tail County) Bulletin writing from Fergus Falls has this to say on the wheat question:

"We notice that your folks over there can beat us on the price of wheat. Now this rather gets away with us. We thought Fergus Falls mills were above all other markets in the county. How does it happen that you are ahead of us? What can be done about this wheat business anyhow? These Millers Associations and railroad companies aiding and abetting each other are just sapping the life out of this country and no mistake about it. I am not a farmer now but I have been one, and know that no man can make any money raising wheat for less than $1.00 per bushel, and why they don't get near that even this year, is owing only to the infernal monopolies which the people may wipe out some of these days by desperate means. There are mills in this county which make 200 per cent. on their capital. They either pay too little for their wheat or get too much for their flour."

Perhaps it is a little of both so far as the mills are concerned. We notice that the mills in Polk County do not seem to help the farming community to any very alarming extent as yet, as they pay no more for wheat than does the Millers Association, and flour costs as much as it used to when the wheat had to be hauled to Minneapolis to be ground and the flour hauled back, making a freight both ways. So far our millers seem to take the advantage of this double freight business in excess of their regular profits. This is not very consoling to the farmers but as it is a big source of profit to the miller who has invested large capital in his mill we suppose it will naturally last as long as there are so few mills in the valley. What is needed here is just what is needed in the wheat market COMPETITION. Every new mill built but hastens the day when the matter will be regulated and if we could be as sure of a railroad to Duluth as we are that this flouring mill business will adjust itself in the near future we should be all right and could well afford to stand a little extortion from our flouring-mills in the start. It is quite a different matter from the Millers Association Monopoly for in the latter they steal the whole business bodily and lug it out of the country while our millers have invested their money in our midst, employ their capital among us and hence are of the two the most endurable and especially so when we consider that the mills are multiplying so rapidly that in a short time there will be competition enough to regulate that matter. And, after all said and done it is the thieving Minneapolis wheat ring that is too blame for it all. Without that monopoly the opportunity would be gone. With an open market, wherein everybody could buy and ship wheat our millers could afford to pay more and still retain a larger margin than outsiders. The few mills we have in the country are the only check the thieving wheat ring have on their steals and while the fact remains that we have all too few yet we can easily imagine where we would be without any mills.

Wilkin County has organized a club called "The Farmers' and Merchants' Protection Association of Wilkin County." Their first meeting was largely attended and showed that the farmers and business men of Wilkin County are fully alive to the importance of the wheat question and that they mean to fight the monopoly. This is an example that should be followed in every county in the valley. "In union there is strength!"

A Talk with the N. P. Tree Man.

Red River Valley News.

Robert Douglas of Waukegan, Ill., who has the contract to establish the Northern Pacific company's experimental forest-tree plantation on section 3 (late of the Barnes & Tenney farm,) was in Glyndon Tuesday and favored the News with a brief outline of the company's scheme of peopling these northern prairies with timber-making trees. Active operations will begin with the opening of spring, looking to the planting of 500 acres with young trees brought from the nurseries of R. Douglas & Son, Waukegan. Fifty or sixty men will constitute the working force, superintended by Mr. D. and trusty assistants in person. Several varieties will be planted—cottonwood, box elder, ash, and a few kinds whose character as indigenous to this latitude is not so well established as those named.

Mr. Douglas is a veteran in this business—one of the half-dozen men in the United States who in a practical sense hold up arboriculture to the rank of a learned profession. He has recently been planting on an extensive scale in southeastern Kansas, where the Missouri River, Fort Scott, & Gulf R. R. Co., have had a section of trees grown—1,740,800 of them—and where eminent success has been achieved.

The new enterprise of the N. P. will have more than local significance, yet Glyndon will feel a special pride and solicitude for the success of the tree-farm which in five years will make a most comely and desirable adjunct to our village.

East Grand Forks Courier.

A few days since Martin Hilliard, living a few miles from East Grand Forks, came to town and drew $100 on wheat, which he had sold. While returning home some time after dark of the same day, and no doubt communing with himself and trying to figure out how many years it would take to make a fortune from 100 acres of land, with No. 1 hard at 76 cents, he was suddenly made aware of the presence of two men, who attempted to stop his team, at the same time demanding his money. Mr. Hilliard is not very proficient in the English language, and failed to comprehend just what his visitors wished, when one of them fired, the ball striking Martin in the mouth and plowing a No. 1 furrow through his under lip to the extent of a quarter of an inch. The horses became frightened and unmanageable, and started across lots, landing Martin at his door in very short notice. Yesterday he appeared upon our streets, and looked sadly demoralized about the mouth. On last Friday evening while Hooker Johnson was driving home, he was met by these midnight marauders, who attempted to waylay him, but Mr. Johnson put his team to the mettle and succeeded in making a safe run. It is about time that an example was made of these highway robbers, and if so fortunate a thing should happen as their arrest, we hope and trust that our citizens will not have recourse to law, but administer justice to them in so summary a manner that nothing will be left undone to provide all with a first-class wake and a No. 1 funeral.

The Holstein cow, Echo, owned by Fred C. Stevens, the proprietor of the Maplewood stock farm, Attica, N. Y. has just completed her year's milk record, which foots up 18,120½ pounds, which is 115 pounds more than the famous cow Aggie, which has heretofore led all the bovines of the world. Echo is 10 years old and weighs 1610 pounds, consequently has given over ten times her weight in milk during the year. The largest yield in one day was 85 pounds, in one month, 4195 pounds.—Minnesota Farmer.

Small Farms.

The United States has many farmers who are "land poor;" they have so much land that they cannot make a living on it. When they have learned that it is not economy to own more land than they can till in the most profitable manner, so that it will pay for the money expended in keeping it free from taxes, weeds, and other encumbrances, they will have solved the problem of ease in a farmer's life. The happiest and thriftiest farmers we have ever known lived on farms of less then one hundred acres—some on farms of only ten acres, every foot of which was made to count. On the other hand, the farmer who has so many broad acres that he cannot walk over them daily, where rods of fence corners are never cultivated or made of any use, lives a life of anxiety and worry. His taxes are heavy and his crops light. He cannot give reasonably thorough cultivation to so much land. Now, if the farmer who owns one hundred acres of land will sell half of it and expend the money received for it in cultivating the other fifty, getting blooded stock and poultry, fertilizers, etc., he can make each acre produce as much as two acres are doing now. His taxes will be less, his cares less, and his gains vastly greater.—The American Farm and Home.

Mortgagee.
JOHN McLEAN, Atty for Mortgagee.
Dated Nov. 28, 1883. [31-37]

MORTGAGE SALE.

DEFAULT HAVING BEEN MADE IN THE payment of the sum of seven hundred and thirty and 71-100 dollars, which is claimed to be due at the date of this notice upon a certain mortgage duly executed and delivered by John J. McLennan to M. R. Brown, bearing date the 28th day of July A. D., 1882, and with a power of sale therein contained, duly recorded in the office of the Register of Deeds, in and for the County of Polk, and State of Minnesota, on the 29th day of July A. D., 1882, at 4 o'clock p. m., in book "H" of mortgages, on page 170, and no action or proceeding having been instituted at law or otherwise to recover the debt secured by said mortgage or any part thereof.

Now, therefore, notice is hereby given that by virtue of the power of sale contained in said mortgage, and pursuant to the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the premises described in and conveyed by said mortgage, viz: Commencing at the northwest corner of lot two (2,) in block twenty-six (26,) of the townsite of Crookston according to the recorded plat thereof on file in the office of the Register of Deeds in and for the County of Polk, and State of Minnesota, thence running in an easterly direction along the south line of Seventh Street a distance of one hundred and forty feet (140,) thence in a southerly course on a line parallel with the east line of Ash Street a distance of fifty (50) feet, thence in a westerly course on a line parallel with the south line of said Seventh Street a distance of one hundred and forty feet (140) to the east line of said Ash Street, thence in a northerly course along the east of Ash Street a distance of fifty (50) feet to the place of beginning, being fifty (50) feet by one hundred and forty (140) feet off of the north side of said lot (2) in said block twenty-six (26) of the townsite of Crookston as aforesaid, with the hereditaments and appurtenances which sale will be made by the sheriff of said Polk County, at the front door of the court house, in the city of Crookston, in said County and State on the 19th day of December A. D., 1883, at 10 o'clock a. m., of that day at public vendue to the highest bidder for cash to pay said debt and interest and the taxes if any on said premises and twenty-five dollars attorney's fees as stipulated by and in said mortgage in case of foreclosure, and the disbursements allowed by law; subject to redemption at any time within one year from the day of sale as provided by law.

Dated Oct. 25th 1883.
MORRIS R. BROWN,
Mortgagee.
JOHN McLEAN,
Attorney for Mortgagee. [27-33]

[First insertion Nov. 29th, 1883.]

MORTGAGE SALE.

DEFAULT HAS BEEN MADE IN THE condition of a certain mortgage, duly executed and delivered by Benjamin J. LaDuke and Mary E. LaDuke, his wife, mortgagors, to M. R. Brown, mortgagee, dated the 29th day of September, A. D. 1882, and recorded as a mortgage in the office of the Register of Deeds of the County of Polk and State of Minnesota, on the 2d day of October, A. D. 1882, at 1:30 o'clock p. m., in book "H" of mortgages, on page 299, on which there is claimed to be due at the date of this notice the amount of two hundred twenty-three 33-100 dollars ($223.33) and no action or proceeding has been instituted at law or in equity to recover the deb. secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof.

The said mortgage was duly assigned by an instrument thereof, duly executed and delivered by the said M. R. Brown to Joseph Kelso, dated the 23d day of February, A. D. 1883, and recorded in said office of the Register of Deeds on the 27th day of February, A. D. 1883, at 4 o'clock p. m., in book "K" of mortgage records, on page 262.

Notice is hereby given that by virtue of a power of sale contained in said mortgage and of the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the mortgaged premises therein described, which sale will be made at the front door of the Court House, in the city of Crookston, in the County of Polk and State of Minnesota, by the Sheriff of said county, on the 25th day of January, A. D. 1884, at 10 o'clock a. m. to satisfy the amount which shall then be due on said mortgage, with the interest thereon and taxes, if any on said premises, and costs and expenses of sale, and twenty-five dollars attorney's fees as stipulated in said mortgage in case of foreclosure.

The premises described in said mortgage and so to be sold is the lot, piece or parcel of land situated in the County of Polk and State of Minnesota, and known and described as follows, to-wit: Beginning at a point fifty feet (50ft) east from the southwest corner of lot one in block forty-four (44) in townsite of Crookston, according to the recorded plat thereof now on file in the office of the Register of Deeds, thence at right angles northerly one hundred and fifty feet (150 feet) thence at right angles easterly and parallel with Sixth street fifty feet (50ft) thence at right angles southerly to the line of Sixth street one hundred and fifty feet (150ft) thence westerly along the line of Sixth street fifty feet (50ft) to the place of beginning, being 50 feet front on Sixth street by one hundred and fifty feet deep.

LOCAL NEWS.

Court convenes on Monday next.

Mrs. Capt. Giest leaves for Washington to-morrow morning where she goes to reside we are told.

Mrs. R. Hussey left on Tuesday morning's train for a visit with friends in St. Paul and Stillwater.

Mrs. A. Braley left on Monday morning for a brief visit to her old home in Vermont.

"Everybody's friend" will be put upon the boards by the Crookston Dramatic Club at an early date.

Mr. E. K. Overland is up from Garfield for a chat with the boys and has gone to St. Hilaire to-day.

The M. E. church is holding a series of meetings every evening this week. They are very interesting.

The electric light wheel has arrived and Jake intends to have his lights trimmed and burning at an early day.

The parsonage is nearly ready for occupancy. It will be ready as soon as the paint has had an opportunity to dry.

Observe the important change in the ad. of the New York Store. It means business and if you want to secure a good bargain "git thar Eli," and Eliess.

Charlie LeSage won the matched game of pool at Ericsson's Hall on Saturday evening last. He handles the cue like an expert in the business.

Such lovely weather as we are having is cause for general remark. We are glad there is something in this country that the Minneapolis Millers' Monopoly cannot control.

The ladies of the Baptist society will give an oyster supper in the Baptist chapel to-morrow (Friday) evening. Come one, come all and get a good supper and help a good cause.

Dept. Sheriff Hopkins is going to Moorhead after Lally to bring the aforesaid Lally before his honor, Judge Stearns to answer to charges of various misdemeanors done in the body.

During the past week the fire department were called out twice. Once to extinguish an incipient blaze at Jim Creighton's and once for a bit of a drill. The boys are getting to be very efficient as firemen.

The new parsonage is indeed a thing of beauty. The transformation it has undergone is wonderful. It contains nine rooms and has only cost $1,300, including the purchase of the original building. It is a property to be proud of.

Mr. Thor. Haatvedt was in from his home in the thirteen towns this week to do a bit of trading and see the boys. Thor. intends to go on a scouting expedition up in the Red Lake pine country this winter to see what that country looks like.

Hon. Paul Sletten has forwarded a long list of names signed to the petitions for opening up the pine lands on the Red Lake Indian Reservation and still there's more to follow. Some action will doubtless be taken by Congress upon the question.

Mr. W. H. McCulough left with his family on Tuesday morning for their new home at Seattle, Washington Ter. Mac is well and favorably known in Crookston and vicinity as a No. 1 painter and all his friends will regret to learn of his departure.

Mr. P. Carroll, of the Northwestern hotel, Grand Forks, greeted us yesterday and the stories he tells of the Minneapolis Millers' steals would convince the most skeptical that there must be something wrong even if we did not experience the very same thing every day.

N. Y. Graphic: The success of "Only a Farmer's Daughter" was conclusively assured last night at this theatre, where it will be repeated during the week to doubtless quite as large an attendance as crowded every available space in the auditorium last night.

We are told that Mr. Wm. Monroe, who worked Judge Spendley's farm north of this city, froze his feet and hands severely on the night of Monday, Nov. 26th over in Dakota where he now lives. It seems that he was going home after dark and lost his way and finding a shanty he went in and stayed all night. It proved that he was only one and one-half miles from home.

Dr. Cable has brought his family to town and is now a resident of the city.

"Only a Farmers' Daughter," will be presented at Ericsson's Hall on Friday evening, Dec. 21st, 1883.

Inquiring of Mr. Stanton, the Second Street meat market man, the price of hogs Mr. Stanton replied that hogs were very cheap, way down in sympathy with wheat which shows that even hogs have more sympathy for the wheat raiser than the Millers' Association has.

C. Kretzschmar's new mill at Red Lake Falls, called Roller Mill A, is completed and commences to grind up the golden grain on Wednesday Dec. 12th. Flour will be exchanged for wheat, and quantities of thirty bushels or more will be ground for farmers and satisfaction in all cases guaranteed. A feed mill will be run in connection. [32-35]

"Consider the Lillys," no that is not what we were about to say at all. We meant to remark that J. W. Lilly and his brother opened their Broadway skating rink to the public on Tuesday evening and had a big crowd and a good time. The rink will be open day and night and if you don't smoke you can sit by the stove inside and skate, for they have just got the finest cigars you ever saw constantly on tap.

Philadelphia Mercury: "Only a Farmer's Daughter" was on Monday evening given its initial performance. Mr. Elliott Barnes has in this production given the public a play that contains very many interesting scenes. It is a society drama of the emotional school, and heavily laden with love, jealousy, and an abundance of wickedness. "Only a Farmer's Daughter" introduces an interesting story, and the tableaux at the close of the acts are good.

Our city schools will be in session two weeks after this before closing for the short term. Mr. Farnsworth, the principle informs the JOURNAL that the schools are all over-crowded there being over 400 pupils in daily attendance. After the two weeks vacation the new building will be occupied and then there should be at least two more teachers employed in order that the most effective work may be done.

A traveling man says that at Fisher last week a Norwegian brought to the elevator a load of wheat with a yoke of cattle and was offered 35 cents per bushel for the wheat upon the excuse that the wheat was frozen. The Norwegian refused and drove off with his wheat. Meeting a neighbor who had a team of horses he asked him to hitch onto his load and take it back to the elevator to see what he would be offered for it, at the same time telling his neighbor of the offer he had. His neighbor complied and was offered and accepted No. 1 Hard for the wheat.

On the 5th day of September last August Kœppe commenced work upon Isadore Fortier's new building, corner of Broadway and Robert streets, and on Wednesday, November 28th, Mr. Fortier took possession. The building is of brick, two stories and basement, 25x75, the height of the first floor ceiling is 14 feet in the clear, and the height of the second floor is 12 feet. The second floor is to be used as a music hall. The first floor is neatly and tastily fixed up and used as a sample room. Besides an elegant bar and fixtures, supplied with the choicest vintages of ages and the best liquors made, the room contains three new and elegant pool tables. The room is neatly papered and numerous pictures grace its walls, making in the whole as neat and pretty retreat of the kind as can be found in the city.

A good deal of complaint is made about the promiscuous ringing of the fire-bell upon all occasions but there need not be if the fire-bell was never rang except in case of fire. We believe the custom now is to first strike the ward in which the fire is, one tap for First ward two for Second, &c. The result is every time the bell strikes for a council meeting or a fireman's drill every body instinctively begins to count to see in which ward the old fire is anyhow. This need not be if when a fire occurs the fire bell is rung rapidly for say a minute which gives the alarm for the fire. Then pause a second or so then strike the number of the ward then slight pause and then go ahead as lively and as long as you choose. If this system was adopted no one would get confused and at the first racket of the bell every body would start for the engine house and thus be on deck ready for business.

Almost an Accident.

On Saturday evening last as Herb Mason was fixing the post office lamps the hook in the wall gave way and down came the whole business with a crash to the floor. Several lamps were smashed and for a few moments confusion reigned. The lighted lamps were soon extinguished and peace and harmony once more prevailed. Save a few slight gashes on Herb's hand no one was injured beyond a general fright, but for a few minutes there were all of the prospects of a first-class fire, and the only wonder is that it was prevented. Jake says that in a few days he will have his electric lights going and will have no further use for the dangerous kerosene.

The Minneapolis Evening Journal has the following item in relation to one of our citizens, Mr. T. B. Walker:

"T. B. Walker, of the firm of Camp & Walker, the largest lumber manufacturers in the State, is a millionaire, having his property chiefly in pine lands in the northern part of Minnesota. His marked traits are his quiet, unassuming air, his shrewd insight, being considered one of the best judges of pine land in the northwest."

FIRST CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH OF CROOKSTON.

Dedicated Last Sabbath.

OUT OF DEBT!

Sabbath day was a red letter day in the history of the Congregational church of this city as its beautiful new edifice was formally dedicated and entered upon its holy mission on that day entirely out of debt. As is well known the members of this church have for a long time striven to build a church and a mere handful of faithful workers, among whom are the ladies of that church, have worked incessantly, had succeeded in getting a fine edifice and a parsonage erected but after all their hard work had failed to raise sufficent money to dedicate the church free of debt. On Saturday morning there remained to raise $1,800, in fact nearly $4,000 for over $2,000 pledged already was contingent upon the dedication free of debt. It did not look any too encouraging but a committee resolutely went to work to find ten men who should contribute $100 apiece. They were not all secured on Saturday and at the beginning of the morning services on Sunday the money was yet to be raised. Rev. Mr. Dana preached an eloquent sermon upon the benefit of churches after which Rev. E. S. Williams made some eloquent remarks and the business of raising the church debt commenced and was so vigorously pushed that when the meeting was dismissed a trifle over $600 remained to be raised. The work was resumed as soon as the opening services of the evening meeting were concluded and in a very short time the necessary amount was pledged and eight dollars besides. Then the doxology was sung and the Rev. Dr. Dana delivered the dedicatory prayer which was followed by appropriate remarks from Rev. E. S. Williams, Rev. Montgomery, Rev. Page, Rev. Dana, and Rev. F. K. Roberts delivered a congratulatory address as representative from the other city churches. Thus the First Congregational church begins its labors unincumbered by the nightmare of debt, and thus will she be the better able to fulfill her high and holy mission. Our citizens have contributed nobly to the good cause and our city has a building of which she may well be proud.

That is what any one will receive who subscribes for The Independent, of New York.

It occupies two fields. First, as a religious journal it is undenominational and broader than any sect. Its aim is to strengthen and extend Evangelical religion and to defend it against the attacks of Materialism, Atheism and unbelief. It is free to approve or criticise in any of the denominations whatever it believes is designed to advance or hinder the progress of the Gospel of Christ.

Among its religious writers are Leonard W. Bacon, D. D., S. C. Bartlett, D. D., Prest. John Bascom, Bishop Thos. M. Clark, Rev. Jos. Cook, Bishop A. C. Coxe, Geo. R. Crooks, D. D., Howard Crosby, D. THE SUN.

NEW YORK, 1884.

About sixty million copies of THE SUN have gone out of our establishment during the past twelve months.

If you were to paste end to end all the columns of all THE SUNS printed and sold last year you would get a continuous strip of interesting information, common sense, wisdom, sound doctrine and sane wit long enough to reach from Printing House Square to the top of Mount Copernicus in the moon, then back to Printing House square, and then three-quarters of the way back to the moon again.

But The Sun is written for the inhabitants of the earth; this same strip of intelligence would girdle the globe twenty-seven or twenty-eight times.

If every buyer of a copy of The Sun during the past year has spent only one hour over it, and if his wife or his grandfather has spent another hour, this newspaper in 1883 has afforded the human race thirteen thousand years of steady reading, night and day.

It is only by little calculations like these that you can form any idea of the most popular of American newspapers, or of its influence on the opinions and actions of American men and women.

The Sun is, and will continue to be, a newspaper which tells the truth without fear of consequences, which gets at the facts no matter how much the process costs, which presents the news of all the world without waste of words and in the most readable shape, which is working with all its heart for the cause of honest government, and which therefore believes that the Republican party must go, and must go in this coming year of our Lord, 1884.

If you know The Sun, you like it already, and you will read it with accustomed diligence and profit during what is sure to be the most interesting year in its history. If you do not yet know The Sun, it is high time to get into the sunshine.

TERMS TO MAIL SUBSCRIBERS.

The several editions of The Sun are sent by mail, postpaid, as follows:

DAILY—50 cents a month, $6 a year: with Sunday edition, $7.

SUNDAY—Eight pages. This edition furnishes the current news of the world, special articles of exceptional interest to everybody, and literary reviews of new books of the highest merit. $1 a year.

GEN. GRESHAM'S REPORT.

POSTOFFICE BOOKKEEPING.

Thirty-seven pages are devoted to Postmaster General Gresham's report, and a large portion of it is statistics. The financial statement shows: Revenues, $45,308,692; expenditures, $42,816,700; balance after deducting estimated outstanding liabilities, $1,001,281. Receipts for the year were $3,632,281 over those of 1882, which is about 3 per cent. less than the average increase for the last three years. Postmasters have been paid $1,350,717, or 15 per cent more than was expended in 1882. Of this increase $700,000 was due to the equalizing act of March 3, which was made to apply to fourth-class offices. The expenditure was $1,515,394.46 in excess of the appropriation. The deficiency was unavoidable, since the law fixes the compensation of postmasters, and orders them to retain it in accounting for the proceeds of their offices. The increase in the expenditure for clerks in postoffices was $458,682.81, or about 11 per cent over that of the previous year; and for letter-carriers it was $350,043.77, or 20 per cent. The estimated total expenditures and liabilities for railroad transportation for 1883 was $11,804,172; the amount credited to Pacific railroad companies was $915,710, making an estimated total cost of railroad transportation for 1883 $12,719,882.

As compared with the previous year, there was a decrease in the expenditure for star service of $1,042,939.58, or 18 per cent. The aggregate appropriations for the service of the year were $44,876,600.18, or $1,284,899.62 more than the total expenditures and estimated liabilities for the same, exclusive of the amounts credited to the Pacific railroad companies.

The receipts for next year are estimated at $47,104,078, and the expenditures, exclusive of amounts to be credited to Pacific railroad companies, at $50,062,189, leaving a deficiency to be supplied out of the general treasury of $2,958,111. The increase of revenue on account of the reduction of letter postage to two cents is roughly put at $2,500,000; the decrease will be $10,393,380.

EMPLOYES.

The number of employes in the postoffice department at Washington is 558. The whole number of postmasters and other employes in the country are as follows: Postmasters, 47,863; contractors, 4,944; clerks in postoffices, 8,040; letter carriers, 3,680; railway postoffice clerks 3,855; postoffice inspectors and railway superintendents, 90. Total, 69,020.

STAR ROUTE SUITS.

It has become my duty since assuming the direction of business in this department to consider the cases upon which payments have been made for expedition in the transportation of the mails on star routes, and after mature deliberation I am convinced that excessive and unjustifiable allowances have been made for the expedited service. The papers and reports in these cases are of such a nature that I have felt constrained to submit the facts and a statement of account in each case to the department of justice, with a request that suit be brought for the recovery of the moneys fraudulently obtained.

NORTHERN PACIFIC THROUGH MAILS.

Through mails for and from Oregon, Washington Territory, Alaska and British Columbia are now dispatched by way of St. Paul and the Northern Pacific, instead of over the Union Pacific and the Utah Northern to Blackfoot Junction, and thence over the Northern Pacific, as heretofore. The former line is 265 miles shorter than the latter, and, on the assumption that the debt due from the Union Pacific company to the United States will ultimately be paid, it is $31 per ton cheaper. In addition to the argument of economy, the convenience of the people living on the northern Pacific coast seemed to demand this change. The amount paid the Northern Pacific for this service, on the basis of the present weight of mails, will be something less than $25,000 per year.

WEIGHT FOR FIRST-CLASS MATTER.

After careful consideration, says Gen. Gresham, I am of the opinion that the unit of weight for rating first-class matter should be changed from one-half an ounce to one ounce. This change, in connection with the recent reduction of letter postage from three to two cents, would place this country on an equality with any other in respect of cheap postage. Great Britain maintains a more liberal unit of weight for rating letters and packages than we do. The following statement shows the rates on different classes of matter in the United States as compared with the leading countries of Europe, the foreign standards of value and weight being reduced to ours:

United States—Letters, two cents per one-half ounce or fraction; postal cards, one cent. Newspapers for publishers, two cents per pound; private rates, one cent per two ounces; samples, one cent per ounce.

Great Britain—Letters, two cents per ounce; three cents per two ounces; postal cards, one cent. Newspapers, one cent per copy; samples not carried by mail.

Germany—Letters, two cents per one-half ounce; postal cards, one cent. Newspapers for publishers, 25 per cent of subscription price. Other printed matter, three-fifths of a cent per one and two-third ounces; samples, two cents per eight and a third ounces.

France—Letters 3 cents per ½ ounce; postal cards, 2 cents; newspapers for publishers, 2-5 cent per copy or per 5-6 ounce; other printed matter, 1-5 cent per 5-6 ounce; samples, 1 cent per 1⅔ ounces.

It is believed that less than 6 per cent. of all the letters conveyed in the mails exceed half an ounce, thus requiring double postage. On these there would be a small loss by increasing the standard of single postage weight to one ounce; but the revenue on the remainder, say 94 per cent of all, would not be diminished, while the loss on the small number in excess of half an ounce would doubtless be more than compensated by the increased postage on small packages of merchandise which would be sealed and sent as first-class matter. By adopting the ounce standard the people would be still further accommodated, and it is believed that a large proportion of fourth-class matter would be sent under seal, paying first-class postage. The revenue of the department would thus be increased without materially increasing the bulk or the weight of the mails.

NEWSPAPER POSTAGE.

Newspaper postage for persons not publishers is 1 cent for 2 ounces. Some papers weigh more than 2 ounces. Many persons mail newspapers weighing over 2 ounces, and bearing a 1-cent stamp. Such papers are not sent. This creates dissatisfaction and complaint. In order to obviate this I recommend that the rate of postage on newspapers and periodical publications, sent by others than the publishers or news agents, be made 1 cent per 3 ounces.

STAMPS ISSUED.

[illegible] were issued during the year as follows: Ordinary postage stamps, 1,202,743,800; newspaper and periodical stamps, 2,207,939; stamped envelopes, plain, 114,251,950; stamped envelopes, request, 160,578,250; newspaper wrappers, 44,436,250; postage-due stamps, 12,609,900; postal cards, 379,516,750; making an aggregate with official department stamps, of 1,861,689,669 and representing a total value of $42,970,310.

RAILWAY MAIL SERVICE.

At the close of the fiscal year there were 993 railway postoffice lines, an increase of 224; 1,97[illegible] crews, an increase of 13; and 108,933.10 miles run by clerks from postoffice to postoffice, as against 98,287.2 miles the previous year. The miles of route for which the companies were paid were 109,827, an increase of 9,264 miles. During the year there were 114 casualties, in which one clerk was killed, 35 seriously injured, and 42 slightly injured. The report renews the recommendation of other postmasters general, that the postmaster general be authorized to pay the widow or guardian of the minor children of a railway postal clerk who is killed in the service, a sum equal to one year's salary of the grade which he held at the time of his death.

GOVERNMENT TELEGRAPH.

The report discusses government telegraph in extenso, three plans receiving attention, viz: First—The acquisition and operation of the existing lines by the government. Second—The construction by the government of lines which it will operate in competition with existing companies. Third—The creation of a company by which lines of telegraph are to be supplied to the capital of each State, and other places having a given number of inhabitants, or where stations are now maintained, or the business of the country may hereafter require them.

From the best consideration which I have been enabled to bestow upon the subject, says Gen. Gresham, I have reached the conclusion that congress has the constitutional power in providing for the postal service of the country to avail itself of all the facilities devised by the inventive genius of modern times for transmitting messages and intelligence, and that it has full authority to adopt either of the first two plans which I have mentioned. Conceding that congress has authority to incorporate a company and clothe it with the power necessary for the effectual accomplishment of the purpose in view, such a measure will inaugurate a new policy, the adoption of which I do not feel at liberty to recommend. If congress can create such a company, it may incorporate railway and other companies, and contract with them for the carriage of the mails; and if this may be done it will not be denied that the government may build railways and other roads, and construct and equip vessels for postal purposes. Congress by such legislation would thus enter upon a new sphere of action, which there is reason to fear would be the first step in a dangerous direction. The patronage of the general government would be enormously increased, and its jurisdiction extended to matters heretofore confined to State legislation or private enterprise. The injurious tendency of such legislation cannot well be overestimated.

CONTROL WITHIN THE STATES.

As to telegraphic service wholly within the several States, unless the power to establish postoffices and post roads be successfully invoked, the existing rates are beyond government control. The opinion has been advanced, that inasmuch as congress has authority to take charge of the telegraph as a part of the postal system, it may do nothing in that direction and yet prohibit citizens and private companies from engaging in the business, unless they comply with prescribed terms and conditions. It is said that the greater power necessarily includes the less, or, in other words, that the absolute power to prohibit includes the limited power to regulate. This doctrine has evidently no application. It is only by exercising its power in some of the modes already discussed, or in some other appropriate way, that the government can prescribe terms upon which competition will be permitted, or prohibit it altogether. When a line is neither owned, controlled or operated by the government, nor in its behalf, a telegraph company, in the transaction of so much of its business as is confined within the limits of a State, is beyond the reach of congress.

I have endeavored to maintain the authority of congress to assume control of the telegraph because it has been, and still is, seriously disputed. The existing companies operate their lines solely for the purpose of making money, and while it is doubtless true that their rates, as a whole, are unreasonable, yet in view of what has already been said, I do not think the evils complained of are so grievous as to call for congressional intervention.

LOTTERIES.

The lottery embroglio is dealt with at length, and the passage of an act is recommended providing that every newspaper which contains an advertisement of a lottery, or any agency thereof, shall be excluded from the mails, and rendering the person who deposits it for sending by mail liable to the penalties which, under existing laws, he incurs for so depositing a letter or circular concerning lotteries.

MISCELLANEOUS.

The suits against the private postoffices were discontinued owing to pleas of ignorance of the law.

The reduction of drop-letter postage to one cent is deprecated in view of the experiment of two-cent postage on mail letters.

An increased appropriation for foreign mail service is advised.

The United States territorial transit charges on the British and Australian closed mails forwarded across our continent during the calendar year 1882 amounted to $113,524.50.

Of correspondence exchanged with foreign countries last year 52 per cent of the letters, 55 per cent of the postal cards, and 60 per cent of other mail matter was dispatched from the United States.

The number of registered letters and parcels sent last year was 10,594,716, of which 7,849,827 were domestic letters; 444,789 letters to foreign countries; 948,075 were domestic parcels; 22,806 were parcels to foreign countries; and 1,329,219 were letters and parcels of official matter for the government. The amount of registry fees collected was $926,549.70, an increase of $85,057.80.

Of letters and parcels opened during the year to restore them to the writers, 15,301 contained money, amounting to $32,647.23; 18,095 contained drafts, checks, money orders, etc., representing $1,381,991.47; 96,808 contained merchandise samples, books, etc.; 66,137 contained postage stamps; 40,215 contained receipts, paid notes, canceled drafts, insurance papers, etc.; 35,160 contained photographs. From letters for which the department failed to find owners the sum of $7,782.16 was separated and deposited in the United States treasury.

ATTORNEY GENERAL'S REPORT.

IMPORTANT RECOMMENDATIONS.

The report of Attorney General Brewster is a comprehensive document, reviewing the work of the department of justice for the past year, giving the present status of the business before the several courts, and making several important recommendations.

The expenditures of the department for the fiscal were $2,920,857.40. Deficiencies, $192,000. The attorney general recommends that the number of witnesses which the United States shall be required to summon and pay for any defendant (except in capital cases) shall not exceed four. The attorney general believes that inadequate compensation to witnesses in the Territories causes many suits to fail because of ill-will of witnesses, who avoid summons, or decline to obey, preferring to be taken to court on a bench warrant. He therefore recommends additional legislation to relieve the people of those hardships, providing that witnesses and jurors be paid their actual expenses in going to, while in attendance upon court, and returning to their places of residence, in lieu of the mileage and per diem now allowed by law.

TERRITORIAL JUDGES.

Under the provision of existing laws there are appointed in each of the Territories (except Dakota) one chief justice and two associate justices. Much complaint is made by the bar and citizens having business before Territorial courts that the same judge who presides at the trials in the district courts also sits in the supreme court when his decisions are reviewed. The justice of these complaints is so apparent that comment is unnecessary. The matter is therefore submitted for your consideration. Since it is essential that the supreme court of each Territory should be composed of an uneven number of judges, the public interest requires that a fourth judge should be appointed in each of the Territories if the judge sitting below is not to sit in review of his cases. Moreover, the business in each of the Territories is sufficient to justify the appointment of another judge, making four instead of three; there is, therefore, no reason why congress should not grant the citizens of the several Territories the relief they ask in this respect.

Recommendation is made for additional legislation for the protection of civil officers in the discharge of their duties, and for the separate confinement of United States prisoners, and to modify the law so as to make plain the fees and duties of jury commissioners. An early revision of the fee bill is necessary, and the attorney general recommends a fixed salary for United States marshals, many of whom have encouraged frivolous legislation to swell their fees to the maximum of $6,000 per annum. The same reasons, in favor of salaried offices, apply with even more force to the United States attorney.

It is desirable that the attention of congress should be directed to the want of proper legislation for criminal cases, in order that the pleadings may be simplified, a uniform system of challenges provided, and the trials shorn of the technical objections and numberless dilatory motions that can now be interposed to prevent a speedy trial upon the merits. Regarding the verbiage in indictments, the attorney general says: To reduce pleadings to a plain and comprehensive statement of the facts would serve equally to the advantage of the government and the defendant. There is no reason why an indictment ought not to be adjudged sufficient and good in law, which charges the crime substantially in the language of the act prohibiting the crime and prescribing the punishment, or so plainly that the nature of the offense charged may be easily understood by the jury; and recommends various other reforms in cases of criminal procedure, with forms submitted for adoption. Regarding laws in force in the District of Columbia, the attorney general says that they are matters involved in such obscurity and doubt that it remains a legal puzzle, upon the solution of which no two lawyers can agree, and there seems to be an imperative necessity for the prompt adoption of a civil and criminal code for the District.

JURIES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The evils that surround the jury system in the District of Columbia demand condemnation. After giving a history of the present system, and the method of drawing jurors, the attorney general adds: The list is drawn from "citizens" of the District. To become a citizen of the District is to lose the right to vote in any other place, hence a large class of intelligent and desirable residents are exempt from jury duty. In the District there is no official list, or list of voters, or assessors' list of taxable inhabitants, such as is found elsewhere, and the jury commissioners are, therefore, compelled to depend upon their own knowledge, or in whatever other way they may find it to be possible to obtain the necessary information. On the first day of the term it is usually found that about two-thirds of each set of jurors answer to their names, the marshal having been unable to find the other one-third. The first business in order is for the court to hear the various excuses offered by the jurors who have been summoned, and who desire to be relieved from duty. At this point it is in order to direct attention to the extraordinary fact that service as a juror in the District means an enforced attendance at court and almost total abandonment of private business for one-fourth of the whole year, a hardship and injustice that is not imposed upon citizens in any other place in the United States, and would not be tolerated in any community where the people have a voice in framing their own laws. Continuous absence and neglect of business for three months in the year would materially injure the interests of any business man. Added to those who are excused on the ground that their health would suffer from this arduous service, are always found among the jurors several who, although their names were placed in the jury-box, and they have responded to the summons, are in public employment and therefore exempt. In selecting talesmen the marshal may summon a man or men from among the bystanders in court, persons passing along the public streets, or from any of the stores, banks, counting houses, offices, hotels, or residences in the city. If the method adopted for selecting and procuring a jury is primitive, inefficient, and censurable, the result attained by that method cannot be sufficiently condemned.

JURY FIXING.

It is the subject of belief and common report that the business of "jury fixing" flourishes to an alarming extent in the District. It is asserted that men live, support their families, and even become rich in the practice of this nefarious profession. As the jury system now exists, that unscrupulous men should safely conduct a lucrative business in debauching juries in the District should occasion no surprise. With but twenty-six jurors such as usually serve, an active jury fixer would become acquainted with at least two or three of them in a few hours, and that would give him a strong beginning in his efforts to thwart justice. It is recommended, in the interest of justice and as a matter of economy, that the number of jurors should be increased to forty-eight, that the time of service should be reduced to one month, that where a deficiency exists in the jury, that deficiency should be supplied from the box, and that an improved system of drawing, selecting and summoning juries should be adopted without delay.

SECURING JUSTICE FOR THE GOVERNMENT.

Independent of those crimes committed in the District of Columbia, which are for offenses affecting the citizens of the District alone, there are others of a public character which are against the whole people of the United States. In every case where a government official has committed a crime against the government he has been prosecuted with determined vigor. When the crime has been committed and tried outside of the District, justice has been accorded the government; but when the crime has been committed and tried within the District, justice has too frequently been denied the government. A person in the employ of the government who betrays his public trust commits a crime against the United States. When that crime is perpetrated within the District, past experience proves that he should be tried before a jury other than that engaged in the trial of the local crimes committed in the District. Laws have been passed by congress broad enough to make every fraud or attempted fraud upon the government a crime to be severely punished. The one great difficulty now encountered is the want of a proper jury system with which to enforce these laws. All plans to defraud the government, or to steal from the public treasury, no matter where contrived, are mostly consummated in Washington, and when the guilty parties are arrested their trial must of necessity take place before a jury drawn in the District. The arrest of one set of defendants brings to them the sympathy and active aid of all others engaged in similar schemes. If the defendants are wealthy, as is often the case, by a liberal expenditure of money they secure the acquaintance and friendship of prominent men who are of a social disposition, and whose open and public association and companionship with the defendants is not without its helpful effect. It is not easy to determine what method to adopt for the trial of these public cases, as any change will be objected to because it may increase expenses. Change of venue and special or struck juries have been adopted elsewhere, to secure protection from a failure of justice because of the defects of local juries, and both methods, wherever existing, are commended. It is of the utmost importance that either or both methods should prevail in the District.

I submit that the desired end might be obtained by extending (in such form and under such limitations as may be advisable) the jurisdiction of the United States circuit and district courts for the judicial district of Maryland, so as to include the cognizance of crimes committed in the District of Columbia. By this the circuit and district courts of that judicial district would have original jurisdiction over all crimes committed in the District of Columbia which are offenses against the general laws of the United States, and their jurisdiction would be concurrent with that of the courts in the District of Columbia, so that the prosecutions and trials could be proceeded with in either courts. The advantages to be derived are, that where the trials take place in the circuit or district court in Maryland, the jury would be drawn in the manner now prescribed by law, from the people of the entire State of Maryland, and the chances of obtaining an impartial jury would be greatly increased.

THE WAR DEPARTMENT.

SECRETARY LINCOLN'S REPORT.

The expenditures by requisition under the direction of the war department during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, were as follows:

Salaries, contingent expenses, and postage	$ 2,146,005 10
Military establishment—Army and Military academy	27,830,976 15
Public works, including river and harbor improvements	15,659,337 31
Miscellaneous objects	4,154,736 86
Total	$49,791,055 42

and the sum of $1,663,151 30 was credited under the act of March 3, 1879 (20 Statutes, 420) to the subsidized Pacific railroads, for transportation services rendered the war department during the fiscal year 1883, and prior years.

The appropriations for the fiscal year 1884 are as follows:

Salaries, contingent expenses, and postage	$ 2,248,121 60
Military establishment—Army and Military academy	24,951,557 60
Public works	1,925,344 80
Miscellaneous objects, including signal service	2,641,928 07
Total	$31,776,952 03

The estimates for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, as revised by me, are as follows:

Salaries, contingent expenses, and postage, including one-third of the estimate of the superintendent of the state, war and navy department building	$2,322,078 33
Military Establishment—Army and Military academy	27,186,152 41
Public works, including river and harbor improvements	11,619,049 63
Miscellaneous objects, including signal service	3,278,926 45
Total	$44,383,206 73

An increase of compensation of chiefs of divisions and other subordinates, and more clerks and laborers are recommended. Estimates will be submitted to supply the deficiencies in the signal service appropriations. The report of the general of the army, which contains, however, no important recommendations, is reviewed, likewise the campaign against the Apaches. There were 3,600 desertions the past year. As a partial remedy for desertion, an increase of the pay of private soldiers to $16 per month is recommended. There were in September 311 cadets at the military academy. It is recommended that the laws should be amended so as to permit officers at remote posts to employ enlisted men, upon the approval of the proper department commander, for domestic purposes where servants cannot be obtained, and that there be restored the per diem allowances to officers serving away from their stations on courts martial and military boards. An appropriation of $15,000 is recommended for the purchase of a piece of land in the District of Columbia for a national cemetery. From Oct. 1, 1882, to Oct. 1, last, forty-six persons were committed to the government hospital for the insane. There were, June 30, 407 prisoners in the military prison at Fort Leavenworth. The number of records of trials by general courtsmartial received, revised and recorded during the year was 1,085, an increase of 131 over the previous year; and the number of records of cases tried before garrison and regimental courtsmartial received and filed in judge advocates' offices at department headquarters during the same period was 8,404. The number of reports and opinions rendered upon courtsmartial and miscellaneous questions of law was 1,487, an increase of 506 over last year.

At the beginning of the last fiscal year there remained in the treasury to the credit of the quartermaster's department $1,182,239.65. The sum appropriated was $11,375,000, and the balance withdrawn at the close of the year $1,295,279 01. Ninety new buildings at a cost of $147,178 have been authorized; repairs have cost $452,[illegible]59. Appropriations are recommended for large permanent posts near Indian reservations and frontiers. Transportation by rail, water, wagon and stage for 65,166 persons, 6,279 animals, and 118,935 tons of material, costing $2,149,051.49.

On June 30 there were on hand 16,400 horses, mules, etc.

Claims under the act of July 4, 1864, awaiting action at the beginning of the year and received during the year aggregated 16,895, amounting to $7,771,174.58; and seventy-one claims, amounting to $44,388.91, which had been presented to boards and commissions prior to Jan. 1, 1880, were called up during the year. The number of claims on which action was taken was 4,993, amounting to $3,492,208.21; and there remained on hand July 1, 1883, 11,974 claims, amounting to $4,323,355.28.

The total number of deaths from all causes reported from the army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, is 242.

The additions to the medical library during the past year include 3,912 volumes and about 5,000 pamphlets, making the total number in the collection about 60,900 volumes and 68,700 pamphlets. The pay department has, during the year, properly accounted for $15,490,310.54. Regarding lake and seacoast defenses, plans have been prepared for the application of the turret system to some of our most important harbors. Our seacoast, with its great cities and important harbors, is defenseless to-day against the attack of a modern iron clad, and it is humiliating even to imagine the mortification, loss of life, property and prestige to which we would be subjected should war come suddenly upon us, as the history of nations shows, may happen at any time.

RIVERS AND HARBORS.

The balance in the treasury July 1, 1882, to the credit of appropriations for improving harbors and rivers was $4,739,263.58. The appropriations by the acts of June 19, 1882, Aug. 2, 1882, and March 3, 1883, were $18,751,335, and $373,592.24 was drawn from indefinite appropriations for constructing jetties in the South pass, Mississippi river; operating and care of various canals; and removing sunken vessels obstructing navigation. The drafts by requisition during the year were $13,841,541.27, leaving a balance of $10,021,649.55 in the treasury July 1, 1883, and on the same date there was in the hands of officers or on deposit to their credit $2,362,254.10. Since that date and up to Nov. 1, there has been drawn from the treasury $4,986,811.27.

Great attention has been given by the ordnance bureau to carry into effect the appropriation made in the act approved March 3, 1883, for making, converting, and testing rifled cannon. A number of contracts have been made, which are in process of execution. The details of the expedition of the Proteus are given. It will be necessary that early provision should be made to fit out another expedition for the relief of Lieut. Greely and his party. The comparatively small portion of the building now occupied by this department is entirely inadequate for its needs, and the security of the valuable public records still stored in scattered hired buildings requires that the new building should be completed without delay.

EDUCATION IN THE ARMY.

The officer in charge of education in the army reports that progress has been made in systemizing and rendering more effective the post schools already established. The average attendance was greater than in the year before. I again recommend legislation authorizing the enlistment of 150 competent instructors, with the rank and pay of commissary sergeants.

I earnestly recommend that the attention of congress be invited to the subject of giving substantial encouragement to the formation of volunteer militia organizations in every State, and in the District of Columbia, by liberal appropriations. With our small standing army, our main dependence must be on our militia. In a memorandum it is stated that the secretaries of war and the navy have decided that it is not practicable to send another expedition to the relief of Lieut. Greely this year. It is doubtful if any vessel could reach Upernavik before Oct. 20, on account of the ice, the rapidly shortening days, and the increasing cold. The danger of wrecking a new relief party in its attempt to reach this place is far greater than should be incurred for the chance of rendering any aid to Greely. Lieut Greely's case is considered by no means hopeless. He has the advantage of daylight to move if he left his station, as ordered, no later than Sept. 1. The days which would be lost in outfitting a vessel and in the voyage to Greenland will be utilized by him. Arriving at Cape Sabine not far from Sept. 15th, perhaps earlier, he will learn of Garlington's disaster, and determine upon plans for the winter. If he attempts to move south upon the Danish settlements, he has 740 rations at Cape Sabine, 240 more on an island in its vicinity west of Brevoort island, and 240 at Littleton island—sufficient without retrenchment for forty-eight days for his command. But he may choose to regain Lady Franklin bay, over a distance of about 250 miles. There he had more than a year's supply of the best assorted food, lights, fuel and shelter. For his journey northward he would have, at Cape Sabine and on the island west of Brevoort, some thirty-nine days' food at starting, and, on his road, depots at reasonable distances, which he will not have emptied on his way down to Cape Sabine. Of these depots there were, at Cape Hawks, over two months' supplies, ten days' at Cape Collinson, and ten at Carl Ritter bay. From one to another of these he can travel comparatively light, sure to find plenty on his return to Lady Franklin bay.

A Healthy Old Ghost.

A Washington correspondent of the St. Louis Globe-Democrat says:

"A very robust ghost of by-gone days, who flits wondrously and unceasingly around the scenes of his former eminence, is ex-secretary Belknap. He is as familiar a figure about the streets and public places as it was in the days when he was a mighty secretary of war. He is received in a matter of fact way by his friends and associates, and were it not for the uncomfortable memory and bigoted notions of some people, there would be nothing out of the way in the presence of the man. Still the unhardened will stare to see him displaying so aplomb, and the big, yellow-bearded fellow with a jovial laugh and a hearty smile does not at all fit into the role of a disgraced and ruined man. Were he thin, pale and hollow-eyed, he might claim the public sympathy and charitable feeling, but with all that insolent and radiant good health and imperturbable demeanor—never!"

A Pretty Big Fish.

From the Carson Appeal.

An Eastern tourist in Nevada had been spinning some incredible fish yarns, when one of the party, turning to an old mountaineer, said: "Bill, that gets away with fishing in this country, don't it?" "Wal, I don't know about that." "Do you mean to say that you have caught more and larger fish?" "No; but I have caught some pretty big fellers." "Come, now, tell us the weight of the largest trout you ever caught?" "Wal, I can't tell exactly as to the weight but you folks can figger on it. Now, you know it is over 200 miles around this yer lake. Put that down. As I said before, I don't know the weight of the biggest fish I ever yanked out, but I did haul one up on the beach, and after I landed him the lake fell three feet, and you can see by the watermark over yonder it hasn't riz since."

TEN CENTS.

This is the sum Mr. A. Burns, three miles east of Cobourg, Ont., says he wouldn't have given for his chance of living before he used Burdock Blood Bitters. He had dyspepsia for fifteen years, and was cured by three bottles of this very excellent preparation.

BY THE DOZEN.

Mrs. J. C. Anderson of Peshtigo, Wis., asks us the price of twelve bottles of Burdock Blood Bitters. They cured her of erysipelas and salt rheum, and she expresses herself as highly pleased about it. She is no more gratified than we are, however.

NUMBER ONE

My wife considers Burdock Blood Bitters a number one medicine. They cured her of dyspepsia and liver complaint when no other remedy she ever tried would do it. This is what Mr. Martin Kizer of Linn Grove, Ind., says.

Burdock Blood Bitters are sold by every druggist. You want to try them; to try them is to like them.

The most comfortable boot in town is that with Lyon's Patent Metallic Heel Stiffeners.

From Col. C. H. Mackey, 33d Iowa Infantry: I have derived more benefit from Ely's Cream Balm than anything else I have ever tried. I have now been using it for three months and am experiencing no trouble from Catarrh whatever. I have been a sufferer for twenty-two years. C. H. Mackey, Sigourney, Iowa. Feb. 22 '82

For three winters I have been afflicted with Catarrh and Cold in the Head. I used Ely's Cream Balm, it accomplished all that was represented.—T. F. McCormick (Judge Common Pleas), Elizabeth, N. J. (Price 50 cents.)

The Treachery of Man.

There is no animal in the world so treacherous as man—a remark easily credited of the authors of the vile compounds sold as tonics. Allen's Iron Tonic Bitters, however, does not belong to this class but is the best medicine of its kind known. All genuine bear the signature of J. P. Allen, St. Paul, Minn.

Sufferers from Coughs, Sore Throat, etc., should try "Brown's Bronchial Troches," a simple but sure remedy. Sold only in boxes. Price 25 cents.

The reason why so many die with consumption, is because they neglect to use the proper remedy in season. When the system is first attacked with a cough, oppression of the chest, or seated pains in the breast, Allen's Lung Balsam will cause the phlegm to raise, heal the irritated parts, and restore the system to health.

This is just the weather for colds, coughs, sore throats, rheumatism, catarrh, etc. Take Dr. Halliday's Blood Purifier and other remedies for a preventive, as well as a cure. They are reliable medicines and sold only on their merits, as all druggists will tell you. Call on or address the proprietor, B Blackford, 274 East Seventh street, St. Paul, Minn. Noyes Bros. & Cutler, Merell, Sahlgaard & Towing, wholesale agents, St. Paul, Minn.

Nervousness, Nervous Debility, Neuralgia, Nervous Shock, St. Vitus Dance, Prostration, and all diseases of Nerve Generative Organs, are all permanently and radically cured by Allen's Brain Food, the great botanical remedy. $1 pkg. 6 for $5. At druggists, or by mail from J. H. Allen, 315 First Avenue, New York.

For Dyspepsia, Indigestion, Depression of Spirits and General Debility, in their various forms; also as a preventive against Fever and Ague, and other Intermittent Fevers, the "Ferro-Phosphorated Elixir of Calisaya," made by Caswell, Hazard & Co., New York, and sold by all Druggists, is the best tonic; and for patients recovering from Fever or other sickness, it has no equal.

Miss Hattie Crocker, who, with Lord and Lady Waterlow, is journeying round the world, is heir to $10,000,000.

ALLEN'S
Lung Balsam!
A GOOD FAMILY REMEDY!
—THAT WILL CURE—
Coughs, Colds, Croup,

Dr. Meredith Dentist, of Cincin'ti, was thought to be in the last stages of Consumption, and was induced by his friends to try Allen's Lung Balsam after the formula was shown him. We have his letter that it at once cured his cough and that he was able to resume his practice.

Jeremiah Wright, of Marion County, W. Va., writes us that his wife had Pulmonary Consumption and was pronounced incurable by their physician, when the use of Allen's Lung Balsam entirely cured her. He writes that he and his neighbors think it the best medicine in the world.

CONSUMPTION.

Wm. C. Digges, Merchant, of Bowling Green, Va., writes April 4, 1881, that he wants us to know that the Lung Balsam has cured his mother of Consumption, after the physician had given her up as incurable. He says others knowing her case have taken the Balsam and been cured. He thinks all so afflicted should give it a trial.

Wm. A. Graham & Co., Wholesale Druggists Zanesville, Ohio, write us of the cure of Mathias Freeman, a well-known citizen, who had been afflicted with Bronchitis in its worst form for twelve years. The Lung Balsam cured him as it has cured many others of Bronchitis.

Allen's Lung Balsam
is harmless to the most delicate child! It contains no Opium in any form!
Recommended by Physicians, Ministers and Nurses. In fact by everybody who has given it a good trial. It Never Fails to Bring Relief.
As an Expectorant it has no Equal.
SOLD BY ALL MEDICINE DEALERS.

Cured Clergymen.

Rev. L. S. Caultan, of Circleville, Kansas, says: Dr. Warner, your White Wine of Tar Syrup has been in my family and found to be all and even more than you claim of it. It is a speedy cure for all Throat and Lung diseases.

My Wife and Children.

Rev. L. A. Dunlap, of Mt. Vernon, says: My children were afflicted with a cough resulting from Measles, my wife with a cough that had prevented her from sleeping more or less for years, and your White Wine of Tar Syrup has cured them all.

Swift's Specific (S. S. S.) has cured me of hereditary Scrofula of the worst type. The medicine is more than you claim for it and I hope any who doubt will write to me. H. C. Hawes, Jr., Clarksville, Ga.

Music Everywhere.

That wonderful musical instrument, the Organetta is advertised in this issue. It is the ideal home instrument. You can dance to it; you can sing to it; a mere child can play it; it inculcates a love of music in old and young, and develops and cultivates the ear. The music is perfectly accurate, and the wonderful Organetta will play any tune. At the price $3.50, it is within the reach of all.

I used Swift's Specific (S. S. S.) for a bad case of Blood Poison from Malaria, and am satisfied that it saved my life as I was given up to die. C. G. Spencer, Sup't Gas Works, Rome, Ga.

TUTT'S
PILLS
TORPID BOWELS,
DISORDERED LIVER,
and MALARIA.

From these sources arise three-fourths of the diseases of the human race. These symptoms indicate their existence: Loss of Appetite, Bowels costive, Sick Headache, fullness after eating, aversion to exertion of body or mind, Eructation of food, Irritability of temper, Low spirits, A feeling of having neglected some duty, Dizziness, Fluttering at the Heart, Dots before the eyes, highly colored Urine, CONSTIPATION, and demand the use of a remedy that acts directly on the Liver. As a Liver medicine TUTT'S PILLS have no equal. Their action on the Kidneys and Skin is also prompt; removing all impurities through these three "scavengers of the system," producing appetite, sound digestion, regular stools, a clear skin and a vigorous body. TUTT'S PILLS cause no nausea or griping nor interfere with daily work and are a perfect

TESTIFIES.

I have been using Swift's Specific in my practice for quite a long time, and I regard it the best combination as a blood purifier and tonic. It is entirely vegetable, being composed of the extracts of roots which grow in this section of Georgia. I am familiar with its history from the time the formula was obtained from the Indians. It is a certain and safe remedy for all kinds of blood poison and skin humor, and there has never been a failure to cure. I have cured blood taint in

CHAPTER I.

"I was taken sick a year ago
With bilious fever."

"My doctor pronounced me cured, but I got sick again, with terrible pains in my back and sides, and I got so bad I
Could not move!
I shrunk!
From 228 lbs. to 120! I had been doctoring for my liver, but it did me no good. I did not expect to live more than three months. I began to use Hop Bitters. Directly my appetite returned, my pains left me, my entire system seemed renewed as if by magic, and after using several bottles I am not only as sound as a sovereign but weigh more than I did before. To Hop Bitters I owe my life."

Neuralgia, female trouble, for years in the most terrible and excruciating manner.

No medicine or doctor could give me relief or cure until I used Hop Bitters.

"The first bottle
Nearly cured me;"
The second made me as well and strong as when a child,
"And I have been so to this day."
My husband was an invalid for twenty years with a serious
"Kidney, liver and urinary complaint
"Pronounced by Boston's best physicians—
"Incurable!"
Seven bottles of your bitters cured him and I know of the "Lives of eight persons"
In my neighborhood that have been saved by your bitters,
And many more are using them with great benefit.

A MUSICAL WONDER
AN ORCHESTRA IN EVERY HOME.

A MUSICAL INSTRUMENT that will play any tune, and that any one, even a child, can operate.

for $3.50.

The Organette has gained such a world-wide reputation, that a lengthy description of it is not necessary. It will be sufficient to say that it is a PERFECT ORGAN that plays mechanically all the sacred airs, popular music, songs, dances, etc., etc. It consists of three strong bellows and a set of reeds with EXPRESSION BOX and SWELL. A strip of perforated paper represents the tune, and it is only necessary to place the paper tune in the instrument, as shown in the picture, and turn the handle, which both operates the bellows and propels the paper tune. The perforations in the paper allow the right reeds to sound and a perfect tune is the result, perfect in time, execution, and effect, without the least knowledge of music being required of the performer; even a little child can operate it, as is shown in the picture, a little girl is playing a song and her playmates are singing the words. It is tuned in the key best suited for the human voice to sing by. It interests and entertains both old and young, assists in training the voice and AFFORDS HOURS OF SOCIAL AMUSEMENT. The Organetta is perfectly represented by the picture. It is made of solid black walnut, decorated in gilt, and is both handsome and ornamental. The price of similar instruments has hitherto been $8, and the demand has constantly increased until now there are over [illegible] in use. We are encouraged to place the Organetta on the market at this greatly reduced price, believing that the sale will warrant the reduction. The Organetta, though similar in construction is an improvement upon our well-known Organette, which sells for $8 and $10. It contains the same number of reeds and plays the same tunes. Our offer is this: On receipt of $7 we will send the Organetta by express to any address and include FREE $3.50 worth of music, or on receipt of $5 we will send it with over $1.50 worth of music FREE, or for $3.50 we will send it with small selection of music, FREE. The price includes boxing and packing. These are agents prices, and we will appoint the first purchaser from any town our agent, if he so desires. Address, The Massachusetts Organ Co., 57 Washington St., Boston, Mass.

What Dyspepsia Does.

It causes grievous pains by day and frightful dreams by night.
It destroys the pleasure of a good dinner.
It sours the disposition and makes its victim cross and petulant.
It makes the breath bad, the eyes leaden, and the skin sallow.
It makes the appetite capricious and unreasonable.
It causes constant grumbling and complaining.

What "Brown's Iron Bitters" Does.

It invigorates the weakened stomach, and enables it to digest.
It promotes the enjoyment of a hearty meal.
It enriches the blood, improves the liver, and cheers the mind
It purifies the breath, clears the eyesight, and makes the skin natural.
It brings a regular and healthy desire for food at proper times.

DEFECTIVE PAGE

An Adventure in Africa.

The first night after leaving Lutete, a disaster occurred to me, but one of such common type in African travel that I venture to retail it to you here so that you may take the good with the ill and not imagine a Congo traveler's experience all sunshine and brightness. We were camped in a village, as usual, and my tent was to all appearance carefully and correctly pegged out. I had eaten a well-cooked little dinner with keen appetite, and had then enjoyed the unwonted luxury of a novel over a cup of coffee. When, at length, I grew tired of reading, I got into bed, leaving my book open, and most of the things lying unpacked and in disorder. I reckoned that there would be plenty of time to pack up in the morning. As I lay on my comfortable bed, soothed by a delicious sense of repose, I heard the rain beginning to pat down on my tent in great drops, while the rising wind soughed mournfully through the neighboring trees: but this dismal state of weather outside only accentuated the sense of comfort and security within the snug tent, and I was quietly falling asleep in a self-satisfied mood, when suddenly the wind rose like an angry devil, and puff! my tent was whipped over my head and laid flat on the ground a few yards off. In a second all was changed, and I was being brusquely awakened from my revery, and half drowned by the drenching rain, which was mercilessly streaming down on all my treasures. My bedclothes were soaked, my novel—I remember it was Alphonse Daudet's "Les Rois en Exile"—was reduced in no time to yellow pap, everything was going to ruin and desolation—the rain even beat the ground up into thick mud which engulfed most of the smaller articles; and all this time I was too paralyzed by the sudden shock and the cold douche of rain to call for help. At last, however, I found my breath, and applied it lustily to a small whistle round my neck. In a minute the Zanzibaris had rushed from an adjoining cottage, and seizing me up in their arms, carried me swiftly into shelter. Here, by the side of a blazing fire, I dried myself and my bed-clothes, and slept soundly on a native bed of matting. It was really wonderful the number of things that were saved from the wrecked tent and dried by the fire, and my losses were limited to the novel afore described and some trifling odds and ends too mixed up with the mud to be detected. I more than appreciated after this catastorphe the admirable qualities of the Zanzibaris, who are never at a loss, and who are the most truly unselfish servants perhaps in the world. It quite touched me to see when I staggered into the hut where they were sleeping how one man gave up his bed, another his musquito curtain, and a third his blankets, in order that the "Little Master" might not catch cold while his things were being dried, and this not only from my own men, between whom and myself a real attachments subsisted, but from Zanzibaris I had only seen and known for three days. The Arab mixture in the Zanzibari men, has not only given them finer features and more refined manners, but has also implanted in them an unselfish affection and a manly gratitude which can never be found in the true negro.—London Graphic.

Life in a Mining Camp.

It is hard to keep separate the fantastic and the sad in one's impressions; hard to decide which has more pathos, the camp deserted or the camp newly begun, the picture of disappointment over and past or that of enthusiastic hopes, nine out of ten of which are doomed to die. I have sometimes thought that the newest, livest, most sanguine camps were saddest sights of all.

The expression of a fresh mining camp, at the height of its "boom," is something which must be seen to be comprehended.

The camp is in the heart of a fir forest, perhaps, or on the stony sides of a gulch. Trees fall here, there, everywhere, day and night. Nobody draws breath till he has got a cabin, or a bough hut, or a tent over his head. As if by magic, there grows up a sort of street, a dozen or two board shanties, with that cheapest and silliest of all shams, the battlement front, flaunting its ugly squares all along the line. Glaring signs painted on strips of cotton sheeting bleached and unbleached, are nailed over doors. In next to no time there will be a "mint," an "exchange," a "bank," a "Vienna bakery," a "Chinese laundry," a "hotel," and a livery stable." Between each night and morning will blossom out crops of "real estate offices," and places where "mining properties are bought and sold," "claims located, proved, bought and sold," "surveys of mining claims made," etc.; crops also, alas, of whiskey saloons, with wicked names and lurid red curtains, danger and death signals.

The stumps are not taken out of the pretense of a road, neither are powders; nobody minds driving over them, or over anything, in fact, so he gets quick to his "claim," or to the tract in which he is feverishly "prospecting." If a brook trickles through the camp, so much the better; it can do double duty as drain and well. Luckiest they who drink the highest up, but they who drink lowest down do not mind. The women, if women there are, are fierce and restless, like the men. They make shifty semblances of homes out of their one-roomed cabins. It is not worth while to have things comfortable, or keep them in order, for there is no knowing whether the camp will turn out to be a good one or not; and to-morrow they may pick up their chattels and move on. At the faintest rumor of a bigger "find," in another camp, the men to whom they belong will be off, and they must follow. They stand in their doorways, idling, wondering, waiting, gossiping, and quarreling. The only placid creatures are the babies, whose simple needs of sun, dirt, and being let alone are amply supplied. They are happy, and they only, in all the camp.

It is a strange life, unnatural, unwholesome, leading to no good, comfortless to a degree which many of those who lead it would not endure a day, except for the hope of great gain, which fires their very veins. The worst of it is that the life is as fascinating as it is unwholesome. "Once a miner always a miner" is a proverb which is little less than the exact truth. The life is simply a gamester's life, with the wide earth for a hazard table, and the instances are rare in which a person who has once come under its spell ever breaks away. It is no uncommon thing, in Colorado, to meet an old gray haired man who has been prospecting and mining all his life, and has not yet made a dollar, but is buoyantly sure that he will "strike it" soon.—December Atlantic.

The trades and labor council of Toronto have presented a memorial to the minister of immigration protesting against the grievances caused by excessive immigration. They claim that no necessity exists for assisted immigration as with the exception of the Northern Pacific railway there is no public work to give employment even to Canada's present surplus population.

KNIGHTED.

Because she takes me as her very own,
Claiming my fealty while life shall last,
My soul renounces all th' unworthy past;
With ruthless hands its idols I dethrone.
I walk life's devious path no more alone;
Her eyes' sweet magic binds my fancy fast.
All aims ignoble from my heart I cast,
For youth's mad follies striving to atone.
Because she loves me, firm I take my stand,
Unflinchingly to battle for the right;
All womanhood is sacred for her sake,
For each oppressed a lance I freely break.
I walk encased in armour pure and bright,
Crowned with honor by her spotless hand.

OLD JOE POLLARD.

BY MRS. DENISON.

How slowly he walked! Poor old man! Joe Pollard, ex-president of the statesman's bank of ——opolis.

His coat was faded, his boots were seamed and gray, his hat greasy and quaint-patterned.

Only three years ago, and no more stately, vigorous, hale gentleman walked the streets than Joseph Pollard, Esq.: now he was "old Joe," and sometimes "poor old Jo ."

When he failed he was living in great splendor. People to this day point out the Pollard Mansion, and tell you of its former greatness. Happily, there was no dishonor attached to his name. He had given up all; home, horses, carriage everything that could be dispensed with.

His only daughter—her name was Josephine, but all her friends called her Jeddy—gave a birthday party only a week before the trouble came, on her eighteenth birthnight.

Never a happier or lovelier girl than she. Universally admired and respected, bright as a sunbeam, witty, merry, generous.

In all that throng of beauty, amid the flowers and the feasting, that man would have been bold indeed who could have presaged coming ill fortune.

Only one week later, and the dreadful news came. Joseph Pollard was bankrupt. The cashier had been dishonest, several large firms had gone down, and the run on the bank had completed the ruin.

The father found a place as an assistant book-keeper, but he had formed the habit of drinking at his own table. Little by little he sank at last into what seemed an utterly hopeless state, lost his business, his pride, and almost his wits.

"My dear," wrote Aunt Prue, when she heard of this misfortune, "put your father away. There are plenty of places; and come and live with me. Enough for one is enough for two."

"Aunt Prue" wrote Jeddy, indignantly, "I am ashamed of you. What! counsel me to put my own dear father in the poor-house, for what other place is open to him? No. I will share his misfortunes if I have to work my fingers to the bone."

"Jeddy, I'm useless. I'm broken down and good for nothing," whined poor Joe, day after day, as Jeddy sat and stitched her life into the work she had undertaken.

"Father, you are only fifty-eight years old," was the answer. "Many a man has begun life anew at your age."

"Ah! if I only could!" he would make reply, and drink again to drown his misery.

Jeddy had carried much of her fine wardrobe with her into the poverty of surroundings. Of course she had made over and toned down the material, but "the took o' the lady," as one of the coarser neighbors said, was upon her, "and couldn't be mistook."

Everybody pitied her when old Joe came reeling home; but few saw or knew how patiently she put up with his infirmity, how she soothed and coaxed him, with what tenderness she anticipated his wants, and even when it would seem that he was scarcely entitled to her respect, honored him.

To her, under all his wretched disguise, he was still her father.

But her constant duties wore heavily upon her. She grew pale and thin, then feverish and hectic; but still she worked on.

Three times a handsome carriage and pair were seen before the door of her plain little home.

The first time, a rich aunt came to remonstrate with her and offer her a home. She found her preparing her poor meal over the tiny cook-stove.

"Jeddy, you are the best girl in the world, but you must go back with me, if only for a while, and leave that man to take care of himself."

This was after a most affectionate greeting, for Jeddy was her favorite niece.

"I couldn't leave father," was the response.

"But I can't see you killing yourself by inches. What does he care? One person is as good as another to one who has lost all the finer sensibilities as he has."

"Oh no; at times father is the old self—even—even at the worst," she faltered "He don't forget that he is a gentleman. He never was unkind to me."

"Fiddlesticks! Your ideas of duty are exaggerated. Come, now—don't disappoint me—take a little rest. I have come all the way from L—— on purpose to cary you back, and the last words your Cousin Kitty said, as I left her, were,—

"Mother, don't fail to bring Jeddy back; I want to see her"

Tears came to Jeddy's brown eyes, but she reiterated,—

"I cannot leave father."

"And here you are losing all your beauty—all your advantages and even your health—I can see it! For your father's sake, you ought to go. It would make a new creature of you to see old sights, and old faces, and to live a while like a Christian. Why, child, the walls are damp; how do you live?"

"It isn't living, aunt, it's only staying," said Jeddy, trying bravely to smile; "but that I can't help, while father lives. There's nobody in all this wide world to care for me but him. I know I might live in ease and comfort if I went with you, and oh, sometimes my heart does long so for a little of the old-time joy. It would be like looking into Paradise—but —I can't leave father."

There sounded a heavy sigh. Both women turned round to see the old, gaunt man in the doorway, the tears streaming down his cheeks as he held forth his trembling hands as if in benediction.

"Go, Jeddy, go, angel!—don't stay for me—I'm not worth your care," he said pitifully.

But Jeddy thought otherwise. Long after the splendid carriage had gone, she sat there holding the gray head against her shoulder, soothing and petting him and lending willing ear to his promises of amendment.

The second carriage brought a stylish young gentleman, with whom her friends had often coupled her name. He came with an offer of marriage, but Jeddy gave him the same soft but determined answer, "I couldn't leave father," and he, too, went away disconsolate.

The third carriage contained one who had always been a friend, also a young gentleman, who had lately returned from a foreign tour.

He asked no questions and expressed no surprise, though the change he saw affected him painfully. But like a true friend, he resolved to aid both father and daughter.

To this purpose he followed the former, and quietly tried to hinder him from the abuse of his appetite, and gradually gained his confidence.

Then he told him how sadly the change in his daughter had troubled him.

"Change!" exclaimed old Joe, "how is she changed?"

"Is it possible you do not see that she is at death's door?"

"What do you mean? At death's door —my child—my angel? You would kill me! What have I but her?"

"You have God, and He will help you to redeem yourself. If you do that, your daughter will live, if you do not, she will die."

That night old Joe went home full of doubts and fears. He watched his child, sick at heart from the news he heard.

"I can make her live—and I will!" he said, resolutely to himself. "I am not an old man yet"—lifting his bowed head—"with God's help, I will be a new one!"

He went to the curb outside and broke his pocket flask in a hundred pieces. The next day he came home sober; the next he had found a place—a small one, it was true, but in the old bank where he had once reigned master. Everybody saw the change. Old Joe had new clothes, he was respectable to outward seeming. Once more he became a man among men. His knowledge of the business, his integrity, gained him a better position. Day by day he took steps upward —day by day the color and brightness came into his daughter's face, and her step grew light and her tones joyful.

It seems like a miracle, but is not, that old Joe rides in his own carriage again. He is Mr. Pollard again, cashier of the bank, and a power among his fellows. It was just trusting in God and God helping him as he helped himself. But the best of it is, his glorious daughter by sacrificing herself, by her noble fortitude, by her patient care, has won a place in his heart and in the hearts of all who know her, prouder and more enduring than the throne of a queen.

The Production of Quinine.

The next step in the relief of malarious sickness on the grand scale was the extraction of the alkaloid quinine from the cinchona-bark. The powdered bark was not only very unpalatable, but it was cumbrous to carry and dispense, and, although the principle of the remedy remained the same, it has proved of infinitely greater service in the form of quinine, and in the form of the cheap alkaloidal mixture known in Bengal as "quinetum." The first extraction of an alkaloid was in the case of morphia, from opium, in 1805; the discoverer was an apothecary of Hamlen, who was rewarded rather better than the celebrated piper of that town for the French Academy of Sciences voted him 2,000 francs. Quinine was discovered in 1820 by the French chemists Pelletier and Caventon. The sciences and arts of botany and practical forestry, of chemistry and practical pharmacy, are now all concerned in the production of this most invaluable of remedies. The commerce of the world has taken cinchona in hand, and there are now plantations of the trees not unworthy to be named beside those of coffee and tea. The value of the crude bark imported into England alone in 1882 was nearly two millions sterling. The original and native cinchona region on the damp eastern slopes of the Andes in Peru is still a source of wealth, and a still greater source of wealth are the new plantations on the Andes in Bolivia. The Indian Government has successfully cultivated the bark on a large scale in the Nilgiri Hills in Madras, and more recently at Darjiling in the Himalayas; while a crowd of private planters have followed in the same enterprise in Coorg, Travancore, and Ceylon. The Dutch Government, who were the pioneers of cinchona cultivation have found the climate and soil of Java well adapted for the species and varieties of trees most rich in quinine. Jamaca is the latest field to which this new and ever-increasing industry has extended.—From "Malaria and the Progress of Medicine," in Popular Science Monthly for December.

Wanted a Novelist.

London Times.

There never was a time when a first-rate English novelist was more wanted than now. Never was the literary output so immense; never during the last forty years, has there been a greater lack of the finest ore.

As one turns over the pages of the novel after that each week brings into the world, one feels more and more invaded by a despairing regret for the days when the workers were fewer and the work done of the highest quality—for the days of Thackeray and George Eliot, or even for the days of "Framley Parsonage" and "the Last Chronicle of Barset."

We have indeed, plenty of clever writing. We have men and women among us who can turn out an admirable chapter, to carry through a light, amusing, and even brilliant conversation. We have Mr. Wilkie Collins for plots, we have Mr. Black for sunsets, we have Mrs. Oliphant, whose variety is inexhaustible, and whose industry is beyond praise.

We have Ouida, who would thrill us with sympathetic emotion if we could for a moment forget the lime-light and the spangles. We have Mr. Henry James, and Mr. Howells, unrivaled painters in miniature. We have Miss Broughton, whose characters, as Mr. Trollope has said, "stand upright on the ground," but whose world is a singularly unpleasant one, and not very much like the world in which poor humanity is destined to live and move. And what is to be said of the twenty or thirty other writers whose books have achieved some kind of popularity, and of the three or four hundred who annually try to achieve it and fail. What we miss in almost all contemporary English novelists, even in the best, is just that last quality which marks out the very good from the good. They fall short of artistic greatness. Either their views and experience of life are very limited or they lack the power of grasping a character, of keeping it firm and consistent, and preserving its due relations to other characters, or their handiwork is heavy. They want breadth or they want finish.

FARM AND HOUSE.

Good to Eat.

Appetizing dressing for fowls is made of mashed potato, well seasoned; for ducks or for wild game a flavor or onion is desirable, herbs also may be added.

To make corn dodgers take five tablespoonfuls of Indian meal and one tablespoonful of flour mixed together. Mix over night with enough boiling water to cover. In the morning put in one egg, one teacup of milk, a little sugar and salt. Bake in muffin rings on a griddle.

A pudding sauce without butter is made by scalding a teacup of sweet milk, then adding a coffee-cup of powdered sugar which you have wet with the yolks of two fresh eggs. When the sauce is thick as custard take it from the fire. When it is cool, add flavoring and the whites of the two eggs, which you have beaten to a stiff froth.

An economical and really delicious way to flavor a cake which is to have icing over the top is to grate part of the peel of an orange or lemon over the cake before putting the icing on.

Often one has gravy left from a roast of beef, and if you have no soup stock to which it may be added, use it to fry sliced cold boiled potatoes in for breakfast. This makes an excellent dish.

It is a good plan to make a little pair of sleeves to draw over the baby's arms when he is playing on the floor, a rubber cord may be run in the top if care is taken not to have it too tight; sleeves made of stockinet draw on and off easily.

CHRISTMAS PUDDING.—Stir three quarters of a cup of butter and the yolks of four eggs together. Add one cup of molasses and two cups of warm milk with two teaspoonfuls of soda dissolved in a tablespoonful of boiling water and added to the milk. Season with a teaspoonful of cinnamon, half a teaspoonful of cloves a little nutmeg and salt. Add flour to make it as stiff as pound cake, and lastly two pounds of raisins stoned and chopped fine, one-quarter of a pound of citron and whites of four eggs beaten to a stiff froth. Tie in a floured bag, leaving room for the pudding to swell, and steam six hours. Serve with wine sauce

Farm Miscellany.

Col. F. D. Curtis writes to the Agriculturalist, and says he never made any money out of pigs alway shut up in a pen, and he does not believe other people can, yet adds; "I have realized a profit when the pigs ran in a clover or orchard grass field, and made a considerable portion of their growth on grass or other cheap feed."

The housekeeper who makes a practice of giving the fowls a mixed meal of warm mush, vegetables, bits of meat and bread, corn cakes and other articles used as food, will quickly discover, besides being economical and cheap, that it is superior to an exclusive diet of grain. Economy leads to wealth, and the poultry keeper who manages to keep his flock in thrift by utilizing the thrift of his kitchen and garden will succeed beyond doubt.

All rules are subject to objections and so is that relating to the depth of drains Where the ground freezes very deeply that would be an exception, and if tiles are used it would be advisable to put them below the reach of the frost. It is very rarely that running water will freeze 48 inches below the ground, because, as a rule, the water in the drain comes from below and not from the surface, and actually tends to warm the soil. Still, if there is any doubt, benefit should be taken of it and a safe depth secured.

Now, creamerymen of the West, shall we supinely sit still and see our business slaughtered by bogus butter manufacturers? Every year witnesses the increase of butterine factories, and the sale of this substitute is rapidly taking the place of every grade of genuine butter except "giltedged" creamery. Every pound of lard thus sold fills the place of an equal amount of genuine butter.—Dairy Farmer.

The potato can be grown as far north as the climate will afford sufficient heat during a growing season of three months. Although it is naturally a native of hot climates, yet it thrives better in a cool one, and acquires there a better quality and flavor. But in cool, moist climates it is exceedingly prone to disease, no doubt on account of a weakened vitality from the combined moisture and low temperature. What the actual limits of its possible cultivation may be no one knows, but it is very probable that it could be grown within the limits of the arctic circle if the seed were carried there.

How Drainage Helps.

Experiment has shown that for the best welfare of crops a soil should not be more than from one-tenth to one-third full of water; that is to say, most of the larger spaces between the solid particles are empty of anything except air. This healthy condition sometimes of itself, when an open subsoil lets the surplus water run away freely from the surface; but usually artificial drainage is necessary to secure it. One of the most marked good effects of this underdrainage, whether natural or artificial, is the improvement in the temperature of the soil. If this surplus water cannot pass off below in due time, it must be evaporated into the air, at the inevitable cost of a great quantity of heat which would otherwise have served to warm the soil; a wet soil, like a wet person coming out of a bath is cold.

The less heat a soil must lose in this way, the greater will be its reserve stock, useful not only for the production of crops but also for their protection against cold. The sun's rays do not warm the air as they pass through it; they warm the soil and the rocks: these then throw out or radiate this absorbed heat into the air and warm it. The lateness of a frost in any locality depends therefore not a little on the reserve supply of heat in the soil; and this again depends largely on the freedom of the soil from surplus water during the heated season; a well-drained and properly dry soil will not only give a larger and better crop than an undrained and wet soil, but its crops will not suffer the harm from early frosts that may ruin the harvest of undrained fields.

Horses at Fairs.

At the late national horse exhibition at New York, among other criticisms, was that of the difficulty experienced by visitors in endeavoring to get a view of the horses. They were kept covered with blankets, and hidden in such ways that for all that concerned the visitors they might just as well not have been on exhibition. This is not an unusual occurrence, in fact, it is quite a usual one at the various fairs, and of which we have heard much complaint. The ordinary stalls in which horses are kept are usually closed and even locked, and if the doors are open nothing of the horse but his hoofs are visible. Horses that at home would be comfortable in an open shed must, when they arrive at the fair, go through the formality of tight housing and blankets as an evidence of superior quality or importance.

Something needs to be done on the part of both exhibitors and fair managers to secure a more complete inspection of horses by those who go to see. Those who go to see pay for the privilege, and they have a right to see whatever is on exhibition; to know who e and what it is. The exhibitors should be interested to have this done because in it they secure public notice that is worth much advertising. The latter could aid very much if they would keep their grooms constantly in attendance to show their stock and give all needful information. Meanwhile until something is done, the exhibition of horses will be entirely unsatisfactory.

Curiosities of Florida Agriculture

Mr. William S. Allen, Chocaluskee, Fla., an old resident of that State, lately wrote a long letter about certain peculiarities of its climate and productions. Some of his notes, gleaned from The Husbandman, will interest readers of The Tribune;

"Many of our annuals are perennials here. One of my neighbors has a fine lot of Lima beans that have been in bearing constantly for three years. They cover a wire fence, about 100 yards long. Egg plant, okra, peppers, cotton, tobacco, all are perennial. As a stalk of tobacco, matures the leaves drop off. Suckers put out, and in their turn ripen a crop, and it is not uncommon to cut three crops a year from the same land. I find in out-of-the-way places a dozen plants of tobacco growing well, scattering seeds and holding their own for years without any care. Wild cotton grows all around me. Some stalks are standing where I found them, when I came here thirteen years ago, and have been full of cotton every spring since 1870.

"I have wondered at the length of time required by you to perfect tomatoes. We picked, in March last, fine ripe, good-sized Acme tomatoes in ninety-four days from planting the seed in hills. We generally are making good daily pickings in 115 days from the seed. We only raise them in the winter, planting from September to December, and gathering Januray, February, March, April and May. June heat kills them and the July and August rain forces them to vine.

"I have also wondered at your at your want of success in making cabbage head. Foottlers, Brunswick and the Winningstadt are certain to head on our lands, I think we can rely on ninety-five in every 100 putting on a good head. In fact a cabbage of those varieties that does not form a head, is seldom found. One land has a base of saline wash always holding salt water consequently the roots of cabbage are always wet.

Winter Flowers.

"Home, home there is no place like home!" How true are the words of our dear departed Mr. Vick when he said that everybody worthy of a home should strive to make it pleasant and cheerful. This is necessary at all seasons of the year, but particularly so during the long tedious winter months. Nothing will aid us in this work as cheaply and easily as flowers. But, alas, how many who have potted their tender plants will meet with the same disheartening reward as last winter, that of having them frozen before spring; and some profiting by last winter's experience, will discard their house plants. Where one's rooms are extremely cold during the night time it is not advisable to attempt the culture of tender plants; neither should plants be cultivated at the expense of the convenience of any member of the family. How soon will the most beautiful plant depreciate its attractiveness when it has to be constantly shifted out of the way? The most convenient devise for holding plants is a hanging basket, in which may be placed various plants and vines. Tradescantia, madorias, or the German ivy are excellent for vines in a common living room, because they are of rapid growth, and will thrive under quite adverse circumstances, and endure any reasonable amount of neglect. Kenilworth ivy is an excellent plant for a shaded corner. If flowers are wanted on the geraniums they should be placed in rather small pots. Fuchias properly attended to make very rapid growth; care should be exercised not to let them get too large before repotting, as few plants suffer equal to the fuchsia when root bound. By the exercise of a little taste a good deal of pleasure can be derived from the cultivation indoors of some of the hardy bulbs. Hyacinths, crocuses, and narcissus are as easily grown in glasses of water as soil; fill the glasses with water and set the bulbs so the roots will be nicely covered, and keep them so. Put them away in a warm, dark place for about two or three weeks, and then bring them to the warmth and light. In all cases where bulbs are potted in water the water should be changed at least once a week. If you have no bulb glasses, any nice-shaped, wide-mouthed, bottles will do, but they should be covered with dark blue paper as the roots are impatient of light. The Dac Van Thol tulips are an excelent variety for house culture. Half a dozen bulbs can be placed in a small box or a large pot and ere long will give a good account of themselves. A pretty and novel way of growing bulbs, and one I practice every winter, is growing them in moss. I have a large, round glass, cover that I fill with bright green wood moss, and in the moss I set a variety of bulbs, always placing the taller variety in the center, and the sides are covered with a mass of mixed crocuses. Before the bulbs get in bloom it is a very pretty ball of green and you only have to wait about six weeks when it is a lovely mass of flowers. Of course, the moss must be kept very moist. They make lovely hanging baskets.

Home Decoration.

Dining-room chairs with antique backs are fashionably upholstered in illuminated leathers, with a border of big headed brass nails.

For bedrooms desirable furnishings are of mahogany, finished either with brass trimmings or surface carvings. Attractive suits are also made of cherry with mahogany finish.

A very graceful and beautiful panel picture may be painted on a common slate. Have the background shaded in color—dark brown to very light is effective. Use burnt umber and white. Be very careful indeed to shade carefully and evenly. A bunch of mountain-ash berries will decorate it tastefully.

In buying baby's first cloak, you will find it economy to make it into a sack with a cape. If you use a baby carriage, the long part of the cloak is quite in the way, and the baby is always covered with an afghan. It can wear a sack until at least two years old, and then it can be used to line another.

A pretty design for a square cover for a table is to make the center of plain satin, then put on a deep border of the crazy patchwork and finish with a rich fringe. The patchwork should be made of bits of embossed or figured velvet and brocade or plain pieces ornamented with embroidery.

It is possible that a soiled plaster figure is among your mantel furnishings. The following directions will aid you in providing it a handsome suit: First coat the figure with white lead tinted with yellow ochre, thinned with turpentine mixed with a small proportion of Japan dryer. When thoroughly dry size with a drying oil, or coach varnish. This should stand until nearly dry, when the bronze can be applied with a piece of soft velvet or camel's hair brush dusting over the work lightly; when entirely hard dust off with a well worn piece of cotton goods.

Square napkins are not in favor at the dinner table. The greater protection to dress that a towel affords suggested the idea of that shape, and as a result we have the long serviettes.

WHEN TO WED.

Opinions on the Subject by Eminent New York Clergymen.

The inquiry into the subject of divorce, now occupying a large share of public attention, discloses that a fruitful source of domestic trouble is the ease with which the marriage relation can be assumed. Licenses are not required in New York, and there is no regulation by statute concerning the age at which persons can be legally married. The general regulation is that of the common law which makes the age of puberty to be the marriageable age. This period is fixed at 14 years in the boy and 12 in the girl. The only statutary regulation in the state on the point makes the marriage of a girl under 14 years voidable if contracted without the consent of her parents.

Whether or not there should be legislation prohibiting marriages at the extremely early age that is now lawful, and whether additional safeguards ought not to be thrown around the family relations by requiring persons seeking matrimony to attest their eligibility in all respects before a licensing officer, are the questions on which a Tribune reporter has obtained the opinions of a number of the leading clergymen of New York and Brooklyn. The burden of their expression is the surprise at the nature of the law and of unqualified opinion, that the legal age is much too young. They speak of deceptions practiced on them by runaway couples, of the means to which they generally resort to prevent impositions on themselves, and generally favor the establishment of a civil bureau for licensing marriages which shall make close examination under oath as to the legal qualifications of candidates.

EXPRESSIONS OF THE CLERGY.

"I do not think," said the Rev. Dr. John Hall, "that the tendency in this country is to marry too young, but rather that young men and women often wait too long in the hope of amassing wealth, before marrying. Moderately early marriages are as a rule, a healthful sign in a nation, I presume there are though, occasional marriages of boys and girls in their teens which are ill-advised and should be prevented or postponed. If all ministers thought alike, such juvenile weddings would not take place."

The Rev. Dr. William Taylor, pastor of the Broadway tabernacle would heartily favor a law making the marriageable ages eighteen and twenty-one years, and fixing penalties for its violations. "Those ages are young enough for people to decide for life such an important step," said he, and, for one, I will never marry people under age when I know it. I think I was never deceived but once about the age of persons applying to be married, and then they were so mature looking that I did not have any misgiving about marrying them. The unsatisfactory state of the marriage laws has often struck me forcibly. I should certainly favor a bureau for licensing people who wish to marry."

The Rev. Dr. Thomas Armitage, pastor of the Fifth Avenue Baptist church, manifested deep concern in the subject. "As to the legal marriageable age," he said, "I think a girl ought to be at least 16 and a young man 18. Even these are very young ages. Of course people differ as to the age at which they mature, and in eastern countries there is more excuse for early betrothals and marriages than here. In this part of the world we should not permit the marrying of boys and girls under the age of 16. The judgment is not ripened enough at that age to warrant a wise choice, and a much different selection would often be made in a very few years later. There is another reform needed, and that is the civil bureau to license marriages. Let persons go there first and satisfy the bureau of the fitness of their proposed alliance, and then, if they wish to come to a minister, bring a license with them."

Assistant Bishop Henry C. Potter, though busy with the affairs of the diocese, found time to say in response to the reporter's query that he should be perfectly willing to be quoted as saying that in his opinion the state laws regarding marriage stood very much in need of revision.

"Is there any rule of the Protestant Episcopal church against such extremely early marriages?"

"No, there is no cannonical rules against them, but I, like most clergy men, have been much averse to marrying people under age. It must strike every one. It seems to me that the law allows marriage at too early an age. I did not know that this law was in force."

The Rev. Dr. Howard Crosby said he had not thought of the subject in all its bearings, but it struck him that if two persons physically qualified to marry, no matter how young, should apply to be married, that the law would not have a right to prevent their marriage. He did not think there were many marriages contracted at the extreme early age allowed by law. But such as there were, he thought, could not be legally prevented.

"It is a great mistake," said the Rev. Robert Collyer, pastor of the church of Messia. "I was not aware that people could marry at twelve and fourteen. If there is a law restricting the age, it should certainly be one with some excuse for it, making the age, say, sixteen and eighteen, or at least fifteen and sixteen. But I would, rather than that, have it at eighteen and twenty one, and then the laws of majority and marriage would not clash. I never marry a young fellow under eighteen, and hate to do it even then. Children are not fit to marry, and at that age they are only children. It is not right; our marriage laws are very deplorable. No, I do not think I would marry young girls and boys even with their parent's consent. They would have to get my consent after that, and I would not give it."

"In twenty years," said the Rev. Dr. W. F. Morgan, rector of St. Thomas' church, "I have never been asked to marry any one under age, with perhaps one exception. If any persons of 14 should ask me to marry them I should seriously remonstrate with them. I do not think they are capable of choosing a life partner at that age, and do not understand how weighty and important are the duties of the wedded state. I think the law might well be amended to prevent such early marriages, and I am in hearty sympathy with any movement to that end."

The Rev. Dr. R R Booth, when spoken to about the matter of early marriages just before he sailed for Europe, said he had always held very decided views on the subject and would never marry people under age, he thought persons younger than that were not competent to make a choice for life, nor mature enough to take on themselves the responsibilities of marriage. The idea of a licensing bureau struck him favorably as an additional safeguard against unhappy marriages.

The Rev Henry Ward Beecher was in a pleasant mood when the reporter asked for his opinion on the legal marriageable age. "Why," said he, "I do not believe that one couple in 10,000 marry at 12 and 14. Of course a good many do at 16. But then a girl at 16 thinks she is as old as any girl under 21 and any girl under 21 thinks she is as young as 16. Why, if any boy is so foolish as to want to marry at 14, I would say let him go."

"What, boys and girls marry at that age?" said the Rev. T. Dewitt Talmage: "how absurd! Well, it is news to me. I never marry people under 18 and 21. It is generally supposed that a man who wants to marry has come to the years of discretion, and is able to support his wife. Not but that I believe in early marriages, but they should be between men and women, and not between boys and girls. It is the worst idea of life in this country that a man should make a fortune before marrying. I believe the man and woman should begin together at the bottom of the ladder. Then their characters assimilate better, and the labor of four hands is sure to bring more enjoyable fruits than that of two hands."

"How many people do you marry in a year, Mr. Talmage?"

"Well, the number varies with the different years, but I marry a good many. Nevertheless I send away half of those who apply to me because there is something suspicious about them. I don't want anything to do with runaway marriages. I used to be deceived occasionally before I became so observant as I now am. I wouldn't marry a woman to a man if her parents objected, no matter how old she was. 'Oh,' they say, 'the wedding is all right.' 'Very well then,' I reply, 'where are your friends. I should like to see some of your relatives present.' They try to deceive me, too, about their ages; dress themselves to look mature, but I have got to be a good guesser of ages. I presume they go to some other minister and get married after all. Now I should think this system would work very well. I think I should favor it. I know it would help me often, and I think it would help others."

LIEUT. LEWIS.

Astor's Seaman Who Blew Up His Ship and Perished Among the Savages Who Had Murdered Captain and Crew.

The venerable David M. Hitchcock who has been a resident of St. Louis since 1837, in conversation with a reporter adverted to a statement published a short time ago regarding the remarkable performance of Russell Faraun, who crossed Behrings strait and went through Siberia to St. Petersburg in the service of John Jacob Astor. Mr. Hitchcock said the account called to mind another person named James Lewis, whom he knew while a boy in New Haven, Connecticut, and who in service of Mr. Astor voluntarily met death in a singular manner. Few similar examples occur in history. Mr. Hitchcock retains a particular rememberance of Lewis from the fact that before he left New Haven he gave him a silver whistle, which he retained as a keepsake of a hero. He said: "Mr. Astor, in prosecuting his scheme of commerce and colonization on the Pacific, determined on sending out two expeditions. One by sea and the other by land, the former to carry out the people and stores, ammunition and mercandise necessary for a trading post a the mouth of the Columbia river. As is well known, the land expedition was entrusted to Mr. Wilson P. Hunt of St. Louis. A ship, the Tonquin, commanded by Capt Jonathan Thorn, a lieutenant in the United States navy, mounting ten guns, with a crew of twenty men, sailed from New York in September, 1810, on this expedition. My friend, James Lewis, was the ship's clerk. After getting to sea the Tonquin was joined by the frigate Constitution and conveyed beyond danger. After various vicissitudes the ship eventually arrived at Vancouver's island and anchored in the harbor of Newetee, where great numbers of the Indians came off in their canoes to trade. Some altercations occurred between the captain and the savages, but the day passed away without any signs of hostility and at night the captain retired to his cabin, taking no more than the usual precaution. This consisted of extending a rope network around the ship to keep off the Indians.

"On the following morning at daybreak a canoe came along with twenty Indians. In a short time other Indians came up and, breaking through the rope network, they clambored up the sides of the ship. The main articles sought by the savages were knives, and the boat was about to sail, when the captain ordered the ship to be cleared. In an instant a signal yell was given, and the savages, rushing on their victims, killed every one on board except Mr. Lewis, who, however, received a deadly stab in the back and fell down the companion way. The Indians then left the ship, and some four or five of the ship's crew, who had put out in a boat and returned found Mr. Lewis and were requested by him to take whatever they could carry away with them and effect their escape. They had gone but a few miles, when the next morning they saw the savages crowding the decks of the ship. The sides were also covered with the savages intent on plunder.

"In the midst of their exultation Mr. Lewis applied a match to the magazine containing the powder, and the ship blew up with a tremendous explosion, Mr. Lewis being immolated with his victims. Arms and legs were blown into the air, and the canoes were destroyed with the inmates. Upwards of a hundred savages were killed by the explosion. Washington Irving who describes the scene in his Astoria, fails to furnish the full name of the heroic James Lewis who became the victim of his terrible revenge.

"James had two brothers whom I knew. One, the, youngest, John Lewis, is still living in New Haven, or was there three or four years ago when I was there. Another brother, Peter Lewis after the death of James, was sent by his father to Shawneetown, Ill, to prevent his going to sea, and he lived and died there in 1815"

Henry Wanted to see the Ballet.

According to the New York Morning Journal Mr. and Mrs. Beecher went to the theater the other night and had a pleasant time. But when the ballet came on Mrs. Beecher asserted herself. "Henry," said he, rising and putting on her cloak. "Yes, yes, dear," replied Mr. Beecher, "just one moment, I——" "Not another moment," said Mrs. Beecher. "We go at once!" "But——" "Henry Ward Beecher don't you dare to 'but' me Come away from here this instant!" Mr. Beecher followed his good lady to the carriage. At the main entrance he lingered for a moment—only one little moment—to catch a glimpse of Cavalazzi as she waltzed to the footlights on her dainty toes.

SOME EVACUATION NOTES.

Great Preparations Making in New York for the Celebration of the Centennial of the Withdrawal of the Redcoats.

How History Is Made, Showing That Historian Headly Draws More on His Imagination Than on Facts.

Gotham Gossip—Monsignor Capel Declares That the Taxation of Catholics to Support Public Schools Is Played Out.

NEW YORK, Special Correspondence, Nov. 22.—Our streets are full of the noise of preparation, as they were a hundred years ago this day. In every house is the hum of expectancy. Then patriots were creeping quietly back through the British lines and reconnoitring the houses they had quitted seven years before, when Washington retreated northward through McGowan's pass—now one of the prettiest nooks of Central park—and crossed the Harlem. Young fellows who had been in the army hurried back to the familiar neighborhood, and shyly inquired about the Sallies and Mollies and Anns and Elizas, lovely and loving of yore, and here and there caught disconsolate looking chaps with red jackets coming out of the front gate, and a surprised face at the window, wet with ambiguous tears. Jolly, sad old times those were. A hundred years ago New York was the third city in the country, and about as big as Kalamazoo is now. All above City Hall park was a cow pasture, and where the Fifth Avenue hotel is was rather a dangerous part of the rural districts. The cow pasture is now a vast human habitation, and it is worth more money than the whole country was then worth. At the celebration of the centennial anniversary next Monday there will be present here more than half as many people as existed in the whole country when the Revolutionary war broke out. A hundred years ago to-day couriers on horseback were carrying to all parts of the narrow strip along the coast, then known as the Colonies, the glad news that New York, which was even then felt to be the vital center of the country, was to be turned over by the vanquished British to the triumphant rebels. The patriot tatterdemalions, in all stages of picturesque rags, were scouring up their muskets and brushing their fluttering garments in the highlands, up the river, in anticipation of the great event. To-day tens of thousands of old soldiers are burnishing up their disused uniforms, and 500 firemen, under Chief Decker, will appear in the red shirts and sheet-iron hats of a former era. For several hours on Monday the trim processions will march and countermarch—the parade of 40,000 in the streets, and the marine parade, more novel and quite as imposing—the multitude of vessels in the river. I don't see what is to prevent the great bridge from breaking down with the great multitude that will crowd upon it.

It is odd how little is known of the real history of that time. It is known that Washington came into the city and resumed possession on Nov. 25, 1783, but scarcely any of the details of the event are recorded anywhere. It is known that he took formal leave of his officers on Dec. 4, the next week, at Fraunces' tavern, a large brick building, still standing at the corner of Broad and Pearl streets; but who participated, what ceremonies there were, and how long they lasted, is mostly a matter of conjecture. That there were imposing ceremonies is not to be doubted; for Washington, spite of the simplicity of his character, was a tactician and a formalist in all social matters. "A president should drive never less than four horses," he said; and when he was president here he maintained the exterior majesty of the office. When he dashed down Broadway in his silver-mounted coach, behind six white horses, with two coachmen in front and two footmen balancing themselves behind, and four liveried persons galloping on horseback in front and rear, and when this gorgeous equipage used to whirl around into Wall street to Federal hall, the capitol, small boys got out of the way. Franklin and Dr. Rush were much scandalized by his "pomposity," as they vigorously called it; but his ceremoniousness filled with glee the souls of John Adams and Hamilton and Jay, who rather thought that a senate elected for life, and more class distinction, would be a good thing.

SOME HISTORICAL ERRORS.

Harper's Magazine for October and November contains articles on this very centennial occasion, and they are as full of errors as if they had been recording the feats of Jack the Giant Killer. The first of these was written by J. T. Headley. He describes in a very picturesque manner—too picturesque, altogether—how Washington took leave of his troops at Newburgh on Nov. 3, 1783, representing that the army was there. He says:

In their ragged regimentals
Stood the old continentals,

to hear the farewell address of their great leaders.

The fact is that there were no troops remaining at Newburgh at the time. They had been disbanded and sent home the previous April. So the pathetic illustration of the old soldiers tearing themselves away from each other is a good deal ex post facto. So is the picture of "Washington refusing the crown," and the guilty conspirator, who offered that bauble, crouching before the indignant and virtuous man. The notion that such an event ever happened was long ago exploded. He probably would have refused a crown if one had been offered to him, but there is no mention in his writings or those of any contemporary of anybody ever having an interview with him and offering a crown or any other piece of royal furniture. But this writer not only gives a graphic and beautiful illustration of an event that never happened, but libels the whole patriot army by making out that the crown was proffered by soldiers who were disgruntled because they had poor rations and no back pay! The distinguished writer dashes along like "our own reporter on the spot" when he says of the imaginary councils at Newburgh:

> The generals, one after another, rode up and dismounted at the door. Wayne and Putnam and Sullivan entered one after another; Steuben rode up from over the river, and Knox and Greene from New Windsor.

It is fortunate that the author is particular to state that they rode up "one after another," and also that they entered "one after another." It could not well have been otherwise. For not more than one or two of them, could possibly have been present on the occasion. Gen. Wayne, "Mad Anthony," and Gen. Greene were both in South Carolina. Gen. Sullivan had resigned on account of ill-health four years previously and was then attorney general of New Hampshire. Gen. Putnam was prostrated with paralysis at Hartford, Knox was at Lake George, Steuben may possibly have been at Newburgh or thereabout, but to suppose him capable of taking part in a council of malcontents who thought seriously of revolting because they had sour bread, is a gratuitous slander. Why doesn't the writer make Benedict Arnold and Gen. Warren enter "one after another?" The article is rich in illustration. It has a fine picture of "Trinity church as it stood in 1783." But Trinity church, unfortunately, didn't stand in 1783. It was burned to the ground in 1776, and was not rebuilt till nearly 1800. What wonder that we make mistakes about Pocahontas, and William Tell, and Shakespeare, and Homer, and Hercules, and Venus, not to mention Noah, and Adam and Eve, when a well-known historian cannot tell any nearer than this what happened in public to the most conspicuous man of his time barely 100 years ago.

AT FRAUNCES' TAVERN.

The old building known as Fraunces' tavern just after the revolution will be a center of interest on next Monday. It was three stories and is now four stories high, but solidly of brick. As I called recently, the present proprietor, Jacob Eitzel, who makes more money from beer than from boarders, took me outside and showed me where the American brick of the upper stories joins the little compact Dutch brick in use 150 years ago, of which the lower part of the walls is made; also, where the interior stairway, used in Washington's time, has been bricked up solid, and the lower court closed. Entrance may now be had from the street direct. The old banquet hall, with high broad window sills, is still pretty nearly as it was when Washington stood at the table (Eitzel declares it is the same table) and took leave of his generals, on Dec. 4, 1783. Irving in his Life of Washington, says of this event:

> The principal officers of the army assembled at Fraunces' tavern, not far from the ferry, to take a final leave of him. On entering the room and finding himself surrounded by his old companions-in-arms, who had shared with him so many scenes of hardship, difficulty and danger, his agitated feelings overcame his usual self command. Filling a glass of wine and turning upon them his benignant but saddened countenance, with a heart full of love and gratitude, said he: "I now take leave of you, most devoutly wishing that your latter days may be as prosperous and happy as your former ones have been glorious and honorable." Having drunk this farewell benediction, he added with emotion: "I cannot come to each of you to take my leave, but shall be obliged if each of you will come and take me by the hand." Gen. Knox, who was nearest, was the first to advance. Washington, affected to tears, grasped his hand and gave him a brother's embrace. In the same affectionate manner he took leave of the rest. Not a word was spoken. Silent and solemn they followed their loved commander as he left the room, passed through a corps of light infantry, and proceeded on foot to Whitehall ferry. Having entered the barge, he turned to them, took off his hat and waved a silent adieu. "Then we all went back to Fraunces'," says a letter of one of the participants, still preserved, "and had some more rum."

Knox had been chief of artillery through the whole war, but was at its close only thirty-three years old. He was a very large man, of soldierly presence, and it is said that his voice could be heard across the Delaware. He was a bookbinder in Boston when the war broke out, and when the British captured the city and forbade anybody to leave with arms, he calmly took his wife on his arm and walked out to Lexington, with his sword concealed under her dress.

WASHINGTON'S LOVE AFFAIRS.

Warlike sentiments on certain subjects still lingered in the heart of Washington on that peaceful morning a hundred years ago, when he resumed possession of this city. As he crossed Spuyten Duyvel creek and made his way upon the island the night before, he received a message to tarry, as Sir Guy Carleton was not yet embarked. So he directed his steps to a great imposing wooden house on Washington heights, still standing and known as the Jumel place. This house twenty-seven years before, had been his Mecca. Here he courted the beautiful and wealthy Mary Phillipse; here for weeks he lingered in the light of her blue eyes; here he left her at her father's till he could hurry off and capture Fort Duquesne, and come back, and here in that fatal interval came Capt. Morris and captured Mary Phillipse and married her before Washington's return. It was an awful lesson to the father of his country, and he solemnly resolved never to be caught out again in matters of that kind. It was the second blow; first, the lowland beauty Miss Gaines, afterward mother of the Lee family, and then the faithless Mary. He had somewhat recovered from the jilting, on this peaceful morning I speak of, for the Morris family had largely multiplied by this time; but the spot was still sore. Tradition has it that he went over and and sat again in the Phillipse parlor and meditated.

"Where is your master?" he inquired of a darky on the porch concerning his former rival.

"He goned wid de British, sah, wen do wah fust bruk out," said the humble servitor. "an' missus, she is crost de ribber, an I is very porely, sah: and mabsa, he was shot wen he was a takin' Fote Moldetreo down in Carliny, fo' year ago."

The visitor knew that well enough, but he was fond of hearing it over again.

"And, mabsa, dey du say dat all dis great fine estate heah is gwine to be confisticated by the devlish rebels. Dat can't be, sah?"

Washington evaded the question. But a year later the great fine estate was confiscated and sold to Jumel by the government, and Washington does not seem to have interposed to save it for Mary and the babies. He ought to have been grateful to her for teaching him such noble lessons; for he learned it so well that when Martha Custis dawned on him he just sat down by her and didn't let her get away from him. But she was a widow, and perhaps didn't want to get away.

MATTERS AND THINGS.

The Appletons have secured Rossiter Johnson as editor of the Cyclopædia. He is one of the most cautious, painstaking and conscientious of literary workmen. Some of the most exhaustive of the admirable book reviews of the Sun have been from his pen.

I met Mr. Felix Moscheles, the eminent English portrait painter, yesterday. He is domiciled at the Park Avenue hotel. On his easel is a striking likeness of Dr. Fordyce Barker, nearly finished, and he is also working at odd moments on a portrait of his wife, one of the most picturesque of women, with oval face, sky blue eyes and golden hair floating negligé. Mr. Moscheles has written a pamphlet that made a stir in England and procured his appointment as a delegate to the peace convention, in which he condemns patriotism because it is "an incentive to warfare!"

The Bartholdi Statue Fund exhibition, to open on Dec. 3, is to be a great affair. All the swell society people are on committees. An original portfolio is in process of construction, to which well known artists and authors contribute. People already heard from are Whittier, Aldrich, Mark Twain, Bret Harte, Howells, Cable, Hawthorne, and several famous artists. Joe Jefferson is painting a picture for it. It will probably be raffled for. Secretary Folger has written an autograph letter, depreciating the raffle, and urging them to dispose of it in some other way. Gen. Sheridan lends his whole fine collection of tapestries. Sherman will lend some masterpieces of art. Grant will lend the presents and trophies of his tour around the world. Cornelius Vanderbilt lends the best of his embroideries. Here will be an uncommon collection of miniatures, of lace, and of missals. Three violins have already been insured for $60,000. Charles A. Dana contributes to the picture gallery good examples of Millet, Corot, Daubigny and Rousseau. During the four weeks of the exhibition the private picture galleries in town will be open to visitors for an admission fee to go to the fund.

I asked a manager, the other day, where all the actors come from. "All around," he said: "they are made, not born—one-tenth genius, nine-tenths mechanism. Frobisher turns out more than any body else, perhaps. Linus and Ella Dietz came from his platform to my stage; Kate Forsyth was his pupil, and so was Florence Wood. He turned out Rebecca Silsbee and Locke Richardson—a very fair job. You ought to go in there some time, and see how the raw material is worked up."

I haven't had time. But I stepped into the Union Square theater to see the new chair which Steele MacKaye is putting in there. The house is shut all this week in order that 830 new seats may be introduced. That a man so very conservative as Sheridan Shook should close his house a week at this time of the year, to reseat it, has rather surprised "the trade." I asked him why it was. "Because," he said, "Mackaye puts in a hundred more of his chairs than the law will allow me of any other, so that I shall get the new chairs paid for twice over this very winter!" And he chuckled and shook the floor. I went in and sat in one. A pleasant, easy chair, the same size as the old chair, but with a foot-rest, movable back, a hat rack, an umbrella rack, and a coat rack, all as complete as can be; and when you rise, the seat rises, folds up snug and swings half-round, so that you pass out directly to the right, left, or rear. At the close of a performance all rise, and all the seats fold up about as snug as closed umbrellas, and every one of the audience finds an open path straight to the door. When all are seated, there are five aisles, instead of three, as at present. The umbrella, coat and hat rack, are very ingenious and wholly adequate. It is a queer concern—this chair is.

I met Mons. Capel on Monday. In reply to my "Is there anything new?" he said "No: unless you care to say that I am going to Washington this winter, to make my declaration on the subject of the public schools." Asking for particulars, he said: "There are 8,000,000 Catholics in this land: they will no longer endure without protest the necessity of being taxed to support your Protestant schools, while they have parish schools of their own. It is to be brought to an issue as an act of gross injustice. If justice is not done to us, there will be trouble." M. Capel will go West to lecture during Lent.

SONGS OF COWBOYS.

FIRST COWBOY.

I'm the howler from the prairies of the West;
If you want to die with terror, look at me,
I'm chain lightning; if I ain't, may I be blessed.
I'm the snorter of the boundless perarie.
Chorus—He's a killer and a hater;
He's the great annihilator;
He's the terror of the boundless perarie.

SECOND COWBOY.

I'm the snoozer from the upper trail;
I'm the reveller in murder and in gore;
I can bust more Pulman coaches on the rail
Than any one who's worked the job before.
Chorus—He's a snorter and a snoozer;
He's the great trunk line abuser;
He's the man who puts the sleeper on the rail.

THIRD COWBOY.

I'm the double-jawed hyena from the East;
I'm the blazing, bloody blizzard of the States;
I'm the celebrated slugger, I'm the beast;
I can snatch a man bald-headed while he waits.
Chorus—He's a double-jawed hyena;
He's the villain of the scena;
He can snatch a man bald-headed while he waits.

MEXICANS AND THEIR DEAD.

The Dismal Customs Which Render the Presence of the Reaper an Exceedingly Unpleasant Occurrence.

The Graveyard a Pot Pouri of Bones Calculated to Give Gabriel a Deal of Trouble.

ESTADO DE COAHUILA DE ZARAGOZA, Special Correspondence, Nov. 19.—The days of All Saints and All Souls, through which we have just been passing, are the saddest of the year to religious Mexico—and that means everybody of Latin blood within her borders. In our own older republic few church festivals, except Christmas and Easter, call for special observance from the people at large; but in Mexico (despite the "new epoch" since the war of church and state, in which the latter is now supposed to rule) the church is still the all-prevailing power. It is said that the holy days in her calendar far outnumber the days of the year, but among them all none touches every heart so tenderly as these two days devoted to the dead. Black Friday—commemorative of the crucifixion—is sad enough; for then no sound of wheel or hammer or human labor is heard; no carts or carriages are permitted upon the streets; and the whole nation, clad in black, goes to church to mourn with the Virgin Mother. But that far-away tragedy, with nearly nineteen centuries between, does not come home to all hearts like the common sorrow of every household—for death is alike a tragedy in palace or hovel. On All Saints' day, after early mass, the people crowd the cemeteries—and it is the only day in the year when those cities of the dead are ever visited, except by sight-seeing strangers. But this day is more especially devoted to the remembrance of those who died in other years—the saints and martyrs and glorious army of "just men made perfect," who are supposed to have safely passed the pains of purgatory and long since become acclimated to the atmosphere of Heaven. On All Saints' day each prays in church for his own dead, and—as "there is no flock, however watched and tended, but some dead lamb is there"—every family, high and low, rich and poor, sends its lamenting Rachel. Cathedral scenes on that day are long to be remembered. For hours the bells tolled dismally and the streets were full of mourning figures, with black shawls or rebosas covering their faces, silently wending their way to the place of prayer. In the center of each darkened church the black-palled funeral dais was erected, with its flickering candles and grim suggestions. The altars were draped with crape, the usual gaudy roses replaced by black ones, and somber banners bore, in Spanish, the words, Remember the Dead. The kneeling crowd, all with devout faces turned toward the cross—the symbol of their hope—repeated their prayers so earnestly that the united voices sounded like the distant roaring of the sea. They were mostly of that sex who are "first at the cradle and last at the tomb;" and it was easy to read in the upturned countenances whose sorrows were freshest. There were orphaned children, the widow in her weeds, the white-haired mother, bereft of sons and daughters—every face had its history. And it did not detract from the solemnity of the occasion to know that the floor upon which they knelt was a succession of trap-doors, covering vaults filled to the brim with the bones of a century's dead.

A DISMAL CEREMONY.

A Mexican funeral is very different from the same sad ceremony in the United States, for here all that is ghastly is brought to the front and every comforting suggestion carefully excluded. Apparently these people mean to enjoy "the luxury of grief" to the full, and decline to be robbed of a single pang. Here no floral tributes are sent by sympathizing friends—no pillows of white carnations, with "Rest" in purple immortelles; no crosses and anchors of spotless lilies; and the dear departed are not laid away in beds of blossoms, with tuberoses upon their bosoms. If flowers are used at all, they are generally the gaudiest of artificial, with leaves and little streamers of gilt papers, precisely like those fastened to iron hooks which are thrust into the bulls' hide during the Sunday divertisement of the Plaza de Torros. I have seen a bunch of these floral monstrosities as big as a cabbage in the waxen hands of a dead lady, and the gray head of an old man crowned with a wreath of blood-red roses, which gave the corpse a rakish air, most comically grotesque. At whatever hour of day or night a person dies in Mexico, it is customary to appoint the funeral services just twenty-four hours thereafter, or as near to it as can possibly be arranged. It is a well-known fact the wide world over, that the majority of souls go out of bodies at that mystic hour between night and day when all the forces of life are at their lowest ebb; therefore—in consequence of the national custom aforesaid—most funerals are conducted before sunrise. All bodies must be carried to the church before being laid in consecrated ground, but it is not the fashion here for women to attend funerals. So the wife, the mother, the sisters, the daughters, take their last farewell "en casa," and the dead are then borne by male relatives and friends, first to the cathedral, and then to the tomb. How mothers can endure this, when their children die, passeth American comprehension, but the iron hand of custom is even more inexorable here than in our own country, and none dream of defying it. About the saddest sights I ever saw, sufficient to make any mother's heart ache, are frequently met in the twilight of the early morning; a little procession of men on foot (with never a woman among them) wending their way to the campo santo—field of saints, as the cemetery is called. The bereaved father marches in front, with the little blue-painted coffin balanced upon his head. The male relatives follow with lighted candles, and the rear is brought up by a boy, carrying the coffin lid. The dead child is plainly visible within the open box, dressed in the gayest clothes, adorned with many paper flowers, and often the little features can scarcely be recognized from the dust of the street which settles upon it before the "dust to dust" process begins. Except among the wealthy, the coffin is not buried with the body, but is merely rented for the journey between house and cemetery, the same pine box, which for adults is painted black, outlined with white and yellow stripes, serving the purpose a great number of times. I learned the wisdom of excluding women from the last horrible rites in this country during my first visit to a "field of saints." Arriving at the grave, whether the body be interred with or without a coffin, it is always first covered with lime, that it may the more quickly decompose. In most cases, the corpse is taken out of the coffin, laid in the dirt without any covering (the sightless eyes wide open) and a quantity of unslacked lime thrown in, and earth shoveled upon it—the sexton now and then jumping in and stamping down with his feet to make all snug. Even then the poor cadaver cannot be said to have gone to his "long home," for, though buried like a dog, he is not sure of his grave long enough to decay decently in. It is an actual fact, all over the length and breadth of Mexico, that (except among the few who are rich enough to own family vaults) the graves are mostly rented for from three months to not more than a year's time.

A MELANGE OF BONES.

Most of these ancient cities have only one small campo santo—a veritable "God's acre" in point of size—wherein the dead of several hundred years have been disposed of. That is the secret of the quick lime. I have looked down into many freshly-dug graves, and all presented the same appearance—the sides a perfect sandwich of layers upon layers of crumbling bones and bits of coffins which the spade had cut through, looking like huge slices of chicken salad or old-fashioned "marble" cake! It is doubtful whether the Scriptures can be fulfilled here as to the gathering together of bones on the resurrection morning. But these good Catholics do not believe in that. They think the body is of no more value after the soul has been safely prayed through purgatory, and no sense of sacredness attaches to the clay casket after the jewel is gone. When the time has expired for which the grave was rented, the occupant is unceremoniously evicted, to make room for a new tenant. If the time has been long enough and the lime active, there is little left to shovel out; but the three months allotted to the vast majority in which to decay is insufficient in obstinate cases, and bones are sometimes unearthed not yet quite bare of flesh, and skulls with capillary adornments still clinging to them. In walking through these campo santos one comes upon ribs, marrow-bones, sections of vertebræ, bits of shrouds and broken coffins at every step. But this is by no means the worst of it. In the rear of each graveyard is a smaller enclosure, which one with weak nerves had better not visit. The first glimpse is enough to make the strongest man forego his dinner; but one gets used to all manner of things in time, you know, and generally ends—as I did—by poking over the bones with his umbrella to find a nice, white skull for an ink bottle! The bones are carted to this charnel house and left in heaps, until the annual cremation time comes around, when they are burned and left for the winds to scatter. Poor Gabriel! what a time he will have on that last great day trying to fulfill his contract in this country! Golgotha must have been an Eden to this place! Every step reveals a new horror. Here are scores of well preserved coffins, still half-full of the lime, which failed to complete its work, mixed with grave-clothes in which the bodies have rotted, their gay colors scarcely faded! Scattered all about are babies' tiny shoes; leather enough in half-decayed boots and slippers to start a shoe-making establishment; women's combs and other paraphernalia; skulls of all sizes, and piles of bones in the corners of the walls higher than a man's head. Here is a skull matted with gray hair; another with a long black tress attached, which doubtless loving hands caressed in other days; and another smaller one—white and shining like ivory—evidently that of a child. Sometimes the stench is intolerable, enough to give the whole country the cholera in any other atmosphere; and we Americans retire from the spot, firm in the determination not to die in Mexico, whatever else we may do.

AT A FUNERAL.

The other day a prominent citizen of Coahuila gave up the ghost, and we determined to attend his funeral, despite the custom excluding women. (By "we" I mean the companion of my wanderings, who calls herself my "frequent pardner"—a la Sairy Gamp and Betsey; and the adventures which one doesn't fall into, the other is pretty sure to find.) The cathedrals are always open, and under pretext of performing our devotions earlier than usual, my friend and I hied us thither. Imagine a gray November morning, at the witching hour of five. The dim old cathedral, full of ghostly shadows, with here and there a few pious souls—mostly women—kneeling upon the floor, murmuring the prayers or whispering at confessional windows. Can anybody tell why it is that most of the praying in this wicked world is done by women? If Heaven is to be won only by that means, I am seriously afraid that the Sweet Bye and Bye will be only a vast colony of glorified saintesses. The funeral pyramid—pine boards painted black, ornamented with skulls, cross-bones and Latin memento mori inscriptions—occupies the center of the church. This pyramid and its four side-pieces (which are shaped exactly like coffins) are stuck full of sputtering candles, in whose flickering light the shadows seem to sway back and forth, like ghostly visitants trailing their shrouds behind them, getting ready to go back into the vaults below, after a nocturnal revel. For Betsy's encouragement, I whispered that cheerful stanza:

Somewhere, in desolate, wind-swept space—
In Twilight land, in No-man's land—
Two shivering shapes meet, face to face,
And bid each other stand.
"And who are you?" cries one agape,
Shuddering in the gloaming light;
"I know not," says the second shape,
"I only died last night!"

Now the funeral procession enters (of course all men), friends and neighbors of the deceased, who bear the coffin upon their shoulders, and deposit it upon the black-palled dais in front of the pyramid. As usual, there is no cover upon the coffin, and the wide-open eyes—with no more "speculation" in them—stare straight up at the great white cross over the main altar. But the blood-stained Christ thereon gives no answering sign to this unhoused soul which seems to say, "This day shalt thou be with me in paradise!" From her shrine at the side of the cathedral, an image of the Virgin—with clasped hands and the dagger sticking in her heart—looks down upon the dead man, as if mourning for the wife and mother who should be there. Now enters a procession of white-robed priests, preceded by a boy bearing a huge brass crucifix, which he places at the head of the coffin. Then follows a long mass, chanted by the priests in a monotonous minor tone—as weird as any Indian incantation in the wilds of our own Northwest—during which much holy water is sprinkled and incense shaken, till the whole vast pile is full of the spicy odor. Meanwhile the sun has risen, and his first beams, coming in at the barred windows high up under the roof, fall aslant the crucified Savior, about whose feet some white doves (who make their homes in the church) are joyously twittering. Now all has been said and done for the dead man that can be, and on the shoulders of those who yesterday were neighbors of this thing to-day called "it," the coffin is borne toward the campo santo, followed by the multitude, each with his lighted candle. Outside a slight shower is just passing over, and a rainbow arches the ancient city, its ends appearing to rest upon the mountain tops at either side. Looking down the narrow calle at the slowly vanishing procession, our thoughts revert to the weeping women in the desolate home, who may not even accompany their dead on its last short journey.

FANNIE BRIGHAM WARD.

Another Gertie Fuller.

The remarkable story recently published of two women being legally married, one of whom was for years disguised in male attire, appeared to have originated in the State of Pennsylvania, but an interesting part of the romance occurred in Abbington, Mass. Here lived Col. Aaron Hobart. Among the children born to the colonel was a daughter, Maria, who received a thorough education and was brought up in refinement. She fell in love with a young farmer named Daniel Perry, and was married to him much against the wishes of her parents. The match proved unfortunate. Maria finally deserted her home, and was found one morning behind a pile of wood, in the town of Rockland, Mass., clasping to her bosom a new-born babe. The child was named after its mother, Maria Perry, and was taken care of by friends after the mother died. She grew up a beautiful girl, but when about seventeen years old she seemed to have an inclination like her mother, to wander about. She would be gone for weeks and then return. Finally she went away, and when heard from was in Pennsylvania. A few years later she returned to Abbington with a husband, whom she introduced as Joe Lobdell, and visited her uncle, Benjamin Hobart. She was kindly received, and her husband was hired to do work about the place. One day a suspicion fell upon the mind of Lawyer Hobart that Joe was a woman in disguise, which an investigation proved to be the fact, and the old man was so indignant that he caused her arrest. She was imprisoned for four months, during which time Maria visited her and carried delicacies to her. At length, neighbors in the lawyer's home prevailed upon him to have the young woman released. When she came out of prison she lived with Maria again. At that time the estate of Maria's mother was settled by E. R. K. Gurney of South Hanson, and the share which fell to Maria was real estate valued at several thousand dollars. This property she has not claimed, but is still in Pennsylvania leading her curious and most remarkable life, although "Joe," her "husband" is at present in the Willard asylum for the insane. Benjamin Hobart, her uncle, died two years ago. Maria has a brother named Daniel Perry, a prosperous business man in South Abbington. She is now about forty years old, while "Joe," her curious "husband," is a few years her senior. The Abbington people believe that "Joe" was the mother of a child that is now living, and that "Joe" and Maria were married in due form by a justice of the peace of Wayne county, Pa., he being ignorant of the fact that they were both women. Several letters written by Maria are in the possession of Abbington people which show her to be an educated and accomplished woman.

ON THE CALIFORNIA HILLS.

Across the broad, brown peaceful hills,
With blossoms to our bronchos' knees,
With singing birds by broken rills,
We rode through seas of drowsy bees.

The ardor of my speech grew still
As we rode on that perfect day,
The brown birds piping from the hill;
The crickets had it their own way.

Then we fell weary with the day,
God's bars of gold across the west
Before us drew and made us stay
Beside a blossomed rill and rest.

The campfire blazed, the bronchos grazed,
And belly-deep in bloom and grass
Would blink, as by the bright flame dazed,
Or sniff to smell the panther pass.

The massive stars of gold stood out,
Bright campfires of poor, weary souls,
Bound heavenward—while all about
Crouched peace, with white patrols.

AMONG THE BOHEMIANS.

A Pleasant but Frugal Family Supper, Flavored with Beer and Tobacco—A Moonlight Picnic in Search of the Succulent Mushroom.

CASTLE MARESCH, Bohemia, Special Correspondence, Nov. 3.—We have left the Austrian Manhartsberg and come to this old castle to spend the harvest home month, the most interesting of all seasons in Bohemia. The Marusskau, a temple hill raised by the Sclaves to their goddess of silence and rest, stands crowned with birch and fir trees just beyond the castle moat, and casts a deep shadow over the meadows, now filled with yellow vetch and purple asters—meadows where once a Roman army encamped, and where, even in these days, the plowboys find coins and medals bearing the inscription and portrait of Hadrian. To the northwest are the celebrated fossil rocks of Beraun, where petrified snakes and trilobites lie scattered among the stones and slates, bearing the impress of lilies and fern leaves. We visited these old slate quarries and chalk hills last week. Our party were so enthused with scientific research after listening to our worthy host's lunch-table talk—the Sclavic legends of the horse with the golden hoofs who made three jumps over the land of the Sclaves, and wherever the hoofs touched a mountain of gold rose from the earth—that we insisted upon going that very day to the nearest "gold mountain." Three of these horshoe-formed hills lie near the Bohemian township of Beraun, one discovered by a French mineralogist sixty years ago contains a slate quarry, where superb specimens of fucoids are found, and a little removed from it, is a precipice of chalk, in which petrifications of unknown periods are lying. It is quite true the stones are petrified worms, and concrete of shells, often so minute as to require a magnifying glass to distinguish them, and these, on a mountain, many thousand feet above the sea. Decidedly the deluge floated many strange things about. One of our party found some superb specimens of coral, and a petrified fish in an iron rock, or rather in ground containing iron ore, and called the "Essenschluct." Our host, the Herr Baron, does not think anything too wonderful for Bohemia. To him it is the first nation of the world, and his after supper table talks are concise reviews of the political, religious, and art history of his beloved land.

A BOHEMIAN SUPPER.

These supper tables are so unlike anything ever found in America that a description may be of interest. At 8 o'clock the notes of a French horn call the family together to a table spread under the lindens of the park. Down from the woodland walks on the Marusskau, or from the rose gardens and gooseberry bushes. (Such gooseberries are never found in other lands—great pulpy, jelly-filled, oval bulbs, the size of a pigeon's egg.) Well, from these corners the guests emerge, and we take our places under the lindens. We sit where we please, waiting, of course, until our hostess has taken her place. There is nothing on the table but the glass-shaded candles, a silver basket of schwarzesbrod (very brown bread), salt sellers and our plates. At a sign from the hostess supper is placed on the table by the servants, who immediately withdraw, with the exception of the oldest family servant, a sort of confidential steward, who remains to serve wine and beer. The menu is very simple, roasted meats or fowls, with French salads, or game with compote, a weak, diluted form of preserves, very little sugar, and a vast amount of water. The best of the repast is Pilsner beer and the baron's stories, and the fun of feeding the dogs, who go wagging their tails round the table begging for bones. They will lap up a saucer of beer and evidently relish it, judging from the increased wag of their tails. When all have finished eating, beer and bread are placed on the table, the former in huge earthenware pitchers, the latter in square "chunks," then the gentlemen light their pipes, and the ladies their cigarettes, and the perfume of the woodlands is lost in Turkish Latakia. Nine o'clock is the hour for retiring. Occasionally the young people steal away from the group at the supper table, and wander off to the hill of silence, "Marusskau," where the full moon shines down through branches of hemlock and weeping birch. Such nights as we have had since our coming to these northern hills repay us for all the losses we sustained during the summer on account of Austrian aristocratic etiquette.

KARLSTEIN.

To-day, after listening to the baron's lecture last evening upon the former wealth of Bohemian kings, we made an excursion to Karlstein, the famous fortress built as a jewel casket for the regalia of the kingdom by Charles IV. of Bohemia. It is a rock fortress in the very heart of mountains covered with forests of oak and cedar, the river Moldau flowing on one side of the rocky height from whence the fortress rises. The tower, in the upper part of which is the chapel where the imperial treasures were kept, rises 125 feet above the battlements. The walls are fourteen feet thick, and the windows, which were of jewels set in leaden frames, are not more than two feet high. This chapel, where the walls are one superb mosaic of agate, amethyst and onyx, reminded us of the cathedral chapels at Prague, seen during our summer wanderings last year. The guide who showed us over the castle told us that in olden times this chapel, during divine service, was lit with 1,333 candles. The more historical chapel of St. Katharina, opening from the private apartment of King Karl IV., is quite as interesting, if not in relics of the early centuries, certainly in richness of decoration and precious stones. Like the Maria chapel of the crown jewels in the tower, the oratory of the king is one vast mosaic of topaz, jaspar, chrysoprasus and chalcedony. Here it was that the pious Karl fasted and prayed three days every year upon the anniversary of St. Katherine, for three times on the festival of that saint his life had been miraculously preserved from the knife of the assassin. On these days no one dared to disturb him. The oratory, where he knelt before an oak prayer-desk of his own carving, is behind the altar of the larger chapel dedicated to St. Katherine, and where the king's family and the court heard daily mass. The entrance to it opens to the right of the altar, through a magnificent oaken carved door, richly inlaid with iron traceries. Through this door, in those days, no one but the king dared pass, and the only means of communicating with the praying monarch was by a narrow hole in the wainscot of the oratory, and reached from a similar opening behind the high altar. Through this narrow passage a crust of bread and a cup of wine and water were passed, and the state papers to which it was necessary for his majesty to immediately fix his signature. It is quite impossible to give any idea of the mosaic work of precious stones in this oratory, and the beauty of its ceiling, composed of sapphires and emeralds. The present stones are imitations, for so many of the real gems were stolen in the Hungarian and Austrian wars with this land, that the decorations of its chapels would have been utterly lost had not the piety of later sovereigns restored their exquisite beauty as well as it was possible in an age of war and famine. The mosaic walls are, of course, formed of the original stone, firmly imbedded in gypsum once washed with gold, but now dead and brown, holding the purple amethyst and pale green chrysoprasus with iron grasp. Our visit to this grandest of Bohemian fortresses quite subdued our taste for less-decorated churches in the neighborhood, so we have urged the baron to take us to every place of historical interest in the surrounding country, and they are many.

A MUSHROOM HUNT.

An account of our "mushroom hunt" last night will be the proper thing with which to close this first edition of Harvest home days in Bohemia. The delicious flavor of Bohemian "pilsen," or mushrooms, led us to ask our fair hostess what they looked like, where they grew, and how she got them.

"The best grow in the Debrichiner wald," she said; "but we have more than fifty species here on the Marusskau. The most delicate are the fleshy, puffy balls of pure white and pink that come up after a shower in the woods."

And then she continued to describe those delightful spicy fungi, so pulpy and richly flavored, which formed an entremet at every meal.

"Yes, the best are in the hunting grounds of Prince Coloredo Mansfeld," she concluded. "It is a delight to look at them."

"And to gather them, mamma!" exclaimed the children, who were dancing about the afternoon lunch table, the hour of Vesper-brod.

"Why not go and gather them then," suggested Sweet Fern.

This proposition was met with universal acclamation, and when the best time for carrying the proposed scheme into fulfilment was asked, "Never put off till to-morrow what can be done to-day," was repeated on all sides. Carriages and horses were instantly ordered; a farm wagon was brought into requisition, in which to transport the servants, baskets and hampers of food for our supper—for Bohemian forests do not contain wayside restaurants, and gamekeepers' huts are not always provided with castle dainties. After a rapid drive of two hours over splendid macadamized roads, we reached the hunting lodge of the prince about 7 o'clock. The most devoted of our mushroom seekers, supplying themselves with lanterns and glass-enclosed candles, went off to the woods filled with mosses, from which spring the spongy tufts of the pilsen and the brown globes of truffles; but the artist element of our party turned toward the forest path which led up to Theresia Hohe, from whence they had a magnificent view of the forests and villages of Western Bohemia. Fortunately for Fern and myself, Pym gave the leader of our "hunt" such an unflattering opinion of our knowledge of mushrooms that we were allowed to linger with the lazier cavaliers around our host, who told us charming stories in the moonlight of haunted turret and castle tower, as we watched the groups of seekers and gatherers, under the old pines, gray with mosses, which surround the grassy openings in the woods where the pilsen abound. The taper lamps of the maidens and their attendants, slowly wandering through the forest underbrush, all wet and damp with the falling dews, reminded some of our party of the Dismal Swamp, where:

"All night long, by her fire-fly lamp,
She paddles her white canoe."

Supper was served at the forester's lodge, and it lasted until near midnight. Our host told such wonderful tales of neighboring castle ruins, and even ventured on the legend of the "gray ladie," which hangs about this very room where I write, that we laughed and trembled with fear in a breath. Excursions to Castle Waldeck and the towers of Zbrihof were promised us next week. To-morrow is the Harvest Festival, and to-day the lady guests are designing their dresses, holding secret audiences with their maids, and misleading everybody who hazzards a guess as to what their costume will be. A bal-masque never made a greater amount of whispering in one household. Our homeward drive last night was superb. The moonlight was glorious, and the roads leading back to Castle Maresch gave us one of the leading panoramas in the world. Mountain heights crowned with ruins of solid silver, broad lakes reflecting silver stars; little hamlets, whose white huts gleamed like dazzling marble under moss-covered thatch, with fringe of wood aster nodding beneath the moon! Two hours of this lovely moonlight, and then the gray walls of the castle beside the Marusskau rose before us, and the heavy oak portals rolled slowly back as the carriages entered the paved court.

BUTLER' NEGRO JUDGE.

How Old Ben Succeeded in Giving Massachusetts Its First Negro Judge—An Account of the Rescue of Shadrach, the Slave.

BOSTON, Special Correspondence, Nov. 22.—Quite an important event has just occurred in this State, and that is the appointment of a colored man to a municipal judgeship. On Monday Gov. Butler's council confirmed the nomination of Mr. George L. Ruffin (colored), as a judge of the Charlestown court, and the oath of office was at once administered to him by Gov. Butler himself. Mr. Ruffin is the first colored judge appointed in this State, and his brethren of similar complexion are exceedingly jubilant thereat. Mr. Ruffin came to be appointed in this way: Just before election time, Gov. Butler, to make political capital and to secure the colored vote, presented the name of Mr. Edwin G. Walker, (colored), to be confirmed as judge. Walker's record was looked up, and found to be bad; and, consequently the Republican council refused to confirm him. Butler used this refusal for campaign thunder, alleging that he was rejected because of his color, and claiming the credit of having nominated him. Before presenting Walker's name, however, Butler had offered that of an Irish politician who had a small law practice. This man's record was exceedingly bad, and the good people of Charlestown arose in their might and induced the council not to confirm him. Then Walker's name was handed in, and the sensible colored people said to themselves that Butler simply did it to get their votes, arguing that if he really intended to advance their race, and had a good-will toward it in his heart, he would have offered Walker's name first, and not offered it to that gentleman second-handed. Consequently, they got mad and voted almost dead against him. After his defeat, Butler, the hypocrite, to make it appear that he was in earnest in presenting Walker's name, nominated Mr. Ruffin, another colored man, and the council, to show that color had nothing to do with it, immediately confirmed him. Mr. Ruffin is a well-educated man, and is entirely fitted for the position which has been given him. He is a native of "Ole Virginny," and came of free parents, who, appreciating the worth of the educational advantages offered in Massachusetts, came here before the war in order that their children might be well taught. Young Ruffin at first started a barber shop, after graduating, but later went into Gov. Gaston's law office. After working there a few years he went to the Harvard law school, graduating in 1868. In the seventies he was in the legislature and in the city government. In almost every walk of life the colored man of Massachusetts, and especially of this city, has gained a firm footing, and in every office and position which he fills he is making an honorable record. Slavery was introduced into Massachusetts soon after its settlement, and less than 200 years ago the slave trade flourished in Boston, and negroes were sold in the market place. It was not until 1855 that the colored children of Boston were allowed the benefit of her schools, and then they were obliged to "flock by themselves."

BOSTON'S COLORED ELEMENT.

I should judge that there were about 6,000 negroes in Boston, most of them comfortably well off—that is, out of reach of actual want—but none of them what you would call wealthy. They support half-a-dozen churches of the Baptist and Methodist denominations, each of which has its pastor. There are a couple of colored doctors in regular practice, and three or four lawyers, all of whom rate high. Robert Morris, who died but a few months ago, was the first colored man to be admitted to the bar. He was an uncommonly sharp and shrewd lawyer, and had a large practice, as did his son, also. One of the most prominent of colored men in this city is Lewis Hayden, now holding a responsible position in the office of the secretary of state. He took a prominent and active part in the famous rescue of Shadrack the slave from the United States authorities in 1850. It was only the other day that he told me all about that affair briefly. He said:

> I was one of a party of ten men, all colored, who had determined to rescue Shadrack at any cost. We carefully made our plans and settled upon the day. Our determination and arrangements were kept secret, and I don't believe a single person outside of the ten knew anything about it. When the day arrived we were all on hand, eager to make the rescue. Two of the stoutest men were assigned to go into the court room close to the dock, while the rest were stationed in the entryway, doorway and along the staircase leading down to the street. The court had adjourned and the officers were about to take Shadrack out to jail when the signal was given and the two stout men inside suddenly seized him, tore him from the clutch of the officers and in a twinkling had rushed him out into the entryway before the authorities could realize what was up. My part of the work was to clear a passageway for them in the entry and then to get into the way of any officer who sought to make pursuit. I did my work up sharp, but had to threaten one big, ugly fellow before I could. Shadrack was successfully taken out of the building and into the street where a carriage and a pair of good horses were in waiting. He was hustled in the carriage, the horses were whipped up and we tore through the streets until we were safe from the authorities. We then took him to a Mrs. Riley's house, on Cambridge street, and rigged him up as a sailor. We then hurried him out of the back door into another carriage, and drove to Cambridge and then to Watertown, where he stayed all night. The next day he was taken back to Cambridge and secreted. Robert Morris, Deacon Scott, myself and a few others, were arrested, but none of us were ever punished for the part we took in the affair.

NELSE.

ROMANCE.

The vision of thine eyes
Is ever in my mind,
Like the glory of the sun
In the memory of the blind.

Wherever I may go,
Lo! thou hast gone before;
I do not find thee there,
Only thine eyes—no more!

They guide me to my room,
They light me to my bed;
I feel them in my sleep
Still watching o'er my head!

Marsh-fires that nightly lead
The wanderer to his home;
So do thine eyes beguile—
I know not to what tomb!

Sense and Sentiment.

Mullach: Diogenes, on one occasion entering Plato's house, while he was entertaining some friends, said: "Thus I trample on Plato's pride." To which Plato replied: "with no less pride."

Emerson: The things that are really for thee gravitate to thee. O believe, as thou livest, that every sound that is spoken over the round world, which thou oughtest to hear, will vibrate on thine ear. Every proverb, every book, every by-word that belongs to thee for aid or comfort, shall surely come home through open or winding passages. Every friend whom, not thy fantastic will, but the great and tender heart in thee, craveth, shall lock thee in his embrace. And this, because the heart in thee is the heart of all.

Carlyle: The situation which has not its Ideal was never occupied by man. Yet here, in this poor, miserable, hampered, despicable Actual, wherein thou even now standest, here or nowhere, is thy Ideal; work it out therefrom, and working, believe, live, be free. Fool! the Ideal is in thyself, the impediment, too, is in thyself. Thy condition is but the stuff thou art to shape that same ideal out of. What matters whether such stuff is of this sort or that, so the form thou give it be heroic, be poetic?

Epictetus: Remember that you are an actor of just such a part as is assigned you by the poet of the play; of a short part, if the part be short; of a long part, if it be long. Should he wish you to act the part of a beggar, take care to act it nobly, and, at the same time, if it be the part of a lame man, or a ruler, or a private man, for this is in your power, to act well the part assigned you; but to choose that part is the function of another.

Marcus Aurelius: If thou findest in human life anything better than justice, truth, temperance, fortitude, and, in a word, thine own soul's satisfaction in the things which it enables thee to do according to right reason, and in the condition that is assigned to thee without thy own choice; if, I say, thou seest anything better than this, turn to it with all thy soul, and enjoy that which thou hast found to be the best. But if thou findest everything else smaller and of less value than this, give place to nothing else. Simply and freely choose the better, and hold to it.

Healthiness of the Jews.

From Food and Health.

"Dr. J. Gibbon, medical officer of health for the Holborn district in London, England, has given out that there is no doubt that the Jew's life in London is, on the average, worth twice as many years as a Christian's. The Hebrews of the English metropolis are notoriously exempt from the tubercular and scrofula taints. It is seldom consumption is found among them; the medical attendants of their large schools in London have testified that Jewish children do not die in anything like the ratio of Christian Children. In Whitechapel, a closely-packed industrial district, the medical officer of health has reported that on the north side of High street—the principal street—occupied by Jews, the death rate is about twenty per thousand, while on the south side; occupied by English and Irish Christians, it is forty-three per thousand."

We take this from a French paper, and our conviction is, that the attention which Jews pay to food and cooking has a great influence on their health. No Jewish family, however poor, goes without warm food; some member of the family is sure to attend to it; much fish is eaten; not so much coarse meat; the meat must be sound and healthy; condiments are used in cooking, and this operation is carried on thoroughly. No wonder that the well-cooked meats of the Jews produces better health and longer life, particularly among the working classes, than the slovenly, rapid cooking of the English and Irish London workman's wife. Naturally, there are exceptions, but upon the whole, the Jewish women of that class attend more carefully to the family wants than the Christian women.

With them there is a religious basis to this careful management, and there should be with us.

Beecher Knows How it is Himself.

At a Pilgrim supper in New York, Henry Ward Beecher responded to the toast "New England." After florid encomium on the pilgrims and the Yankees generally, he said: Are we going to maintain what our fathers believed? Are we children worthy of the fathers? I say we are. I hold that the industry of New England has not gone out, except to all ends of the earth. [Laughter and applause.] The old New Englanders lived on ground granite, and committed burglary on nature to get a living out of it. [Laughter.] I know something about it myself, for I used to get up at 4 o'clock in the morning at this season of the year to do the chores and make the fires. I used to go two miles to school, and used to sit on Sundays in a church in which they thought that a fire was a sacrilige. I used to live where the old fire-place would hold logs ten feet long, which required two men to roll them in. I knew what it was to work. Did you ever hoe potatoes on a hillside just after the alder bushes had been cut off? [A voice, "Yes." Laughter.] I am glad that there is one real Yankee here. [Laughter.] Well, I have. Did you use to stand in your doorway yard and not be allowed to go down town to see the training? I did. [Laughter.] One of the great sorrows of my life was to hear the base drum down in the village and have a father, who was so solicitous on the morals of his son, that he would not allow him to go out of the yard to see the soldiers train. [Laughter.]

Eloped With Her Brother's Groom.

From the Toronto Globe.

A sensation was created in social circles in England a few months ago by the elopement of Major Forsyth Grant's wife with her brother's groom. Major Grant is attached to the Duke of Cornwall's regiment, which is stationed at Gibraltar, and it was during a visit to her brother, who lives near Treganth Fort, a place several miles west of the Cornish side of the river Tamar, near Plymouth, that his fascinating wife became enamored of the personal charms of her brother's groom, whose name is Henry Hearn. The two became very intimate, and in a few days eloped. A most vigorous search was made for the missing pair, but no trace of them was found in the country. Three weeks ago Mr. Eden, a lawyer from London, England, who was employed by Major Grant to recover his wife if possible, arrived in Quebec, as he was of the opinion that they had come to Canada. The services of Detective Skeffington were called into requisition, and in company with Mr. Eden, that officer visited Point Levis and exhibited a photograph of Mrs. Grant to a number of wharf officials there. They recognized it as being that of a lady who arrived by the steamer Circassian on the 10th of October last, in company with a young man. The pair were traced to the St. James Hotel, where the photograph was again recognized. It has since been ascertained that they took Pullman passage to Montreal, and thence to Toronto, where it is believed they are now living as man and wife under the assumed name of Purches or Nicolls. The lady's private income is £5,000 a year, but she only had £30 in cash when she left England. Mrs. Grant, who is well acquainted with Canada, having been here on her wedding tour five years ago, is described as follows: Twenty-five years old, five feet high, fair complexion, grey eyes, fair hair, cut short in front, wore a long cloak lined with fur, and had on a diamond necklace when in Quebec. She left two little children in England. Hearn, the groom, is five feet eight inches high, brown hair, hazel eyes, small mustache, and has a sprightly appearance.

PITH OF THE NEWS.

Washington News Notes.

A telegram from Washington says that last summer Henry M. Poor, compiler of the Railway Manual, became satisfied that the Northern Pacific Railway company was concealing a large floating indebtedness, and that the stock must suffer a heavy decline He formed a syndicate and sold the stock secretly to the amount, it is said, of 40,000 shares. The stock was above 80 and went below 40. The profits were in the neighborhood of 2,000,000.

Senator Edmunds is preparing a postal telegraph bill, which he will submit to the senate soon after congress meets. His idea is to have a trunk line, connecting the capitals of the various states with the national capital as a main center, and then have the lines in the states radiate from the state capitals to the reading postoffices. He is opposed to the purchase of any of the existing lines.

General News Gossip.

Denver Special: Baron T. W. De Constan Rebuque, who represents the Dutch syndicate of the Maxwell Land Grant company, and who is a prominent banker and counselor of Amsterdam, has gone east. He it was who caused the arrest of Frank R. Sherwin, the New Mexican cattle king, and son-in-law of ex Gov Gilpin, of Colorado, a few weeks ago, on the charge of misappropriating about $94,000 of money which rightfully belonged to the Dutch company. Sherwin was president of the company, and the utmost confidence was reposed in him.

The World prints an interview with an intimate friend of Samuel J. Tilden, in which it is stated that the latter remodeled his Gramercy park building especially for an artists public institution. Under his will, the building and the splendid library collection will be left in trust to the city for a public library, the trustees to be Henry Watterson of Louisville, and Manton Marble and John Bigelow of this city. The property and contents is estimated at $1,000,000. The endowment will be sufficient to support the institution.

Col. Archibald Blakely, a prominent attorney and counsel for Milton Weston of of Chicago, claimant of the Murraysville natural gas well, was arrested in Pittsburg the other night for complicity in the late riot. The Criminal Record.

Samon, the triple butcher of Laconia, N. H., confesses to being the murderer of James Ruddy and child and Mrs. Ford. Samon says he killed Mrs. Ford at 9 o'clock on the morning of the 3d inst. He did not attempt to outrage her. She was killed in a drunken squabble. She showed signs of life about ten minutes, and he attempted to bring her to life. Failing, he became frightened, chopped her body, put it into a trunk, started off to dispose of the body, and carried it to Ruddy's house, where he was somewhat acquainted. He then left the trunk in front of the house, where it remained two hours. He took it into the house about dark, and during the night became nervous and could not sleep. When it was near morning, and he had no opportunity to dispose of the body, he concluded upon the plan of killing the Ruddy family and burning the house, thereby destroying evidence of his guilt.

At Springfield, Tenn., a negro boy, Pete Jones, confined in jail for carrying concealed weapons and attempted rape, was found horribly mangled on the floor of the corridor, his head mashed to jelly. The only other prisoner was Earnest Northington, a white man, a desperate character, charged with stealing a mule.

An old Frenchman of disreputable character, known as Margelestiah, was shot dead five miles from Campbell on Dec 1st. He was attacked in his claim shanty and undertook to escape, when he was shot in the back, and his neighbors who heard the firing found him dead on the prairie.

The Casualties of the Week.

At Red Wing early on the morning of the 29th fire broke out in the lower story of the Centennial block on Third street, occupied as a tailor shop by Henry Nelson and a music store by W. H. Barculoo & Co. In the west half of the building was the Goodhue county Savings bank and the law office of Hoyt & Akers. The second story was occupied by Dr. F. A. Williamson, dentist, Benham & Hoyt, real estate, collections and insurance and a sleeping apartment occupied by J. Holt. In the third story was the hall of the Scandinavian Relief association. The fire was first discovered in an elevator connecting the basement and first story in the back room of the tailor shop. The total loss was about $20,000.

Governor's building, one of the most important blocks in Burlington, Iowa, occupied by clothing firms, the American Express company and a large number of offices. was burned early on the morning of the 3d inst. Total loss, $50,000; insurance, $30,000.

Fred. Wittenberg, a single man twenty-six years of age, was found dead in his room at the Davenport house in Winona, on the morning of the 27th. He had been drinking hard, and the coroner found that he came to his death from the excessive use of liquor.

Dr. J. O. Gunsally, one of the most prominent citizens and successful physicians of the Black Hills, was thrown from his carriage in Deadwood recently, fracturing his skull. He is at a hotel insensible, and is believed to be fatally injured.

Joseph Lath, working on the Duluth & Iron Range railway, wandered into the woods near Agate Bay while intoxicated, on Nov. 7, and has not been found, although dilligent search has been made.

Foreign News Gossip.

On the 30th inst., in the Old Bailey police court, London, began the trial of O'Donnell for the murder of James Carey, the informer. Gen. Pryor is mentioned in the dispatches as appearing among the counsel for the prisoner, though he will, doubtless, not be allowed to take any part in the proceedings. A jury was quickly obtained, owing to the fact that no challenges were made by the prisoner. Thus far the evidence given has been the same as that given in the preliminary examination.

London Cable: The English government is sorely troubled and perplexed over the spread of the land league agitation, which, despite the most strenuous efforts on the part of the authorities, daily grows and increases in strength. The same as that which has so long been a source of dissension between the landlord and tenant in Ireland is now in active progress in some section of Wales.

The vast Mohammedan university at Cairo, to which 12,000 pupils are sent from all parts of the Moslem world, and which is the principal seat of learning of that faith, has declared against the claim of El Mahdi to be the representative of the prophet, and denounced him as an imposter. This accusation, it is thought, cannot fail to greatly lessen the invaders chances of success in his ambitious scheme.

Death of Prof. Donaldson.

The many friends of Prof. O. S. Donaldson, editor of the Alexandria Post, will be pained to hear of his sudden death, which occurred at 3 o'clock on the morning of the 27th. At the railroad station he dropped dead on the platform. Prof. Donaldson was born in Muskingum county, Ohio, Feb. 29, 1831. He graduated from the Ohio Wesleyan university, and was a successful teacher in that state for twenty years. During the war he served as a commissioned officer in the United States navy. In 1866 he was admitted to the bar in Ohio. In 1868 he was elected professor of rhetoric and English literature in Minnesota State university, a position he held for five years. In July, 1874, he accompanied the Custer expedition to the Black Hills as a special correspondent of the Pioneer Press. In August 1875, he bought the Alexandria Post, and has published that paper from that time until his death. He leaves a wife and four children.

Another Bad Week for Failures.

Bradstreet's Journal furnishes the following: There were 232 failures in the United States reported to Bradstreets during the past week—four more than the preceding week, forty-six more than the corresponding week of 1882, and seventy-four more than the same week of 1881.

The important firms reported embarrassed were: May & Mayer, wholesale cloths, and John L. Farge, artist and decorator, New York. The Merill & Houston Iron Works company, Beloit, Wis., Lion Brewing and Bottling company and John Lichter, malster, Denver.

Lafayette Cook, an old man living at South Auburn, Me., announced to his friends two weeks ago that he should die within a fortnight, and at later intervals referred to it. He prepared himself for the coffin on Monday, though apparently in usual health, bade his friends good bye, stretched himself on the lounge and passed into a slumber from which he never wakened.

The Question of Terms.

Attorney General Hahn is constantly receiving inquiries in regard to the terms of office of the recently elected county officials. He has already delivered the following opinion, in reply to P. Fitzpatrick, county attorney of Winona county, which applies to all cases. At his request it is printed in full:

As to the superintendents of schools, I hold in an opinion this day given to the superintendent of Wright county, that these officers take their office Dec. 1, as heretofore, because the result of the constitutional amendment (Chap. 2, Laws 1883), will not be ascertained, nor the proclamation of the governor be issued until after Jan. 1, and the amendment is not in force until these things are ascertained and done. As to county treasurers a different conclusion must be arrived at, because the result of the vote and the proclamation of the governor will, in the ordinary course of events, be ascertained and made before the first Monday of January, 1884. If it shall appear that the amendment is adopted, all laws inconsistent with it will, pro tanto, be imperative, and the clause in said amendment providing that "all terms of office shall terminate at that time," viz., the first Monday of January in each year will be the rule and guide in the future, notwithstanding anything in any of the laws of this State to the contrary. I am, therefore, of the opinion that the newly-elected county treasurers will take their offices on the first Monday of January, instead of the first day of March, as heretofore.

A syndicate composed of about two dozen merchants at Litchfield has just been organized to buy wheat at an advance of 3 cents per bushel over the regular price, so as to benefit the farmers as well as bring more wheat to market. The farmers are greatly dissatisfied at present prices, and the amount coming in is not on the increase, but the contrary.

John Henry, who assaulted his wife and shot at her in Little Trout Valley, Winona county recently, was examined and held to bail in $500. He is also under bail in $500 on a charge of seduction.

Fergus Falls, Minn., in a week or ten days will have a new weekly paper entitled the Democrat. Capt. J. D. Wood of St Paul left for Fergus Falls the 27th, and will take charge of the new weekly, which, as its name implies, will be Democratic in politics.

The state auditor is now engaged in sending out tree bounties, thousands of which are to be paid at the rate of $2 and $3 per acre.

A Litchfield letter says the syndicate organized there a few days ago to raise the price of wheat three cents per bushel were successful, but are not yet satisfied, and so go the Miller's association prices one cent better still. Merchants are generally paying in trade, six to seven cents higher, but the farmers are quite backward in coming forward.

In reply to a communication from Sarah B Crawford, in behalf of a large number of women of Anoka county complaining that the law forced them into the anomalous position of holding and discharging the duties of an office for which they cannot vote, Attorney General Hahn recently referred her to the opinion already rendered to the effect that women are entitled to vote for school officers within the district in which they reside; and they are eligible to hold the office of county superintendent but not to vote for that office. Two supreme court decisions, of Massachusetts and Kansas were cited, holding that the right to hold an office were two distinct rights, one not implying the other. This matter has aroused much interest in different parts of the state, and it is very probable that it will be submitted to the supreme court on a test case.

Mr. Charles A. Hinze, one of the earliest settlers of Blue Earth county, died quite suddenly, on the morning of the 2d from congestion of the lungs.

Charles Van Campen, for many years past station agent of the Chicago & Northwestern railway at Rochester, has been promoted to the charge of the station at Winona.

A stock company is to be organized at Slayton to build a flouring mill at that place.

The total amount raised by taxation for the different funds in Freeborn county is as follows: State $9 690 28 school, $31,649.23 county, $21 839 52 town, $2 584 96; other taxes, $18,395 32. Total $84,059.31.

At Plainview, a twelve year old son of Rev. J. Tisdall while skating broke through an air hole. Mrs. Winters, seeing the accident, hurried after a ladder and a small iron garden rake. She slipped the ladder into the air-hole where the boy disappeared and going down upon it felt around with her rake until she got hold of him, when she soon brought him to the surface, when, after hard work he was restored to consciousness.

Ten years ago Mr. Morrison of Winona disappeared, and several years after, his wife married William C. Hodge of Spring Valley, and lived with him four years. A few weeks since, the first husband made his appearance, and Mrs. Hodge packed her household effects and returned to her first love, and they are now living together in Dakota.

Mrs. M. J. Davis of Duluth was found dead in her home, the discovery being made by her daughter. It is believed she died of apoplexy.

Nomination of Carlisle for Speaker.

The democratic caucus of the National House of Representatives was held on Saturday night, and John G. Carlisle of Kentucky was nominated by a vote 106 to 52 for Randall and 30 for Cox. Gov. Curtin moved on the part of Randall to make the nominations unanimous, and Mr. Dorsheimer did the same for Mr. Cox. Gov. Curtin moved that a committee be appointed to notify Mr Carlisle of the action of the caucus, which was carried, and the chair appointed Messrs. Curtin and Cox to perform the duty.

Upon the entrance of Mr. Carlisle to the chamber of the house he was greeted with applause, and made a brief, calm and felicitous speech. He said:

Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen of the Caucus: Your committee has just notified me of my unanimous nomination to the office of speaker of the house of representatives, Forty-eighth congress, and I am here to thank you very briefly and very earnestly for the confidence reposed in me. If this had been a mere contest between me and either of those distinguished gentlemen whose names were mentioned in connection with this nomination, I should have had little hope of success. They are all gentlemen of great ability, long experience and undoubted integrity, and I assure them and their friends that this contest closes, so far as I am concerned, without the slightest change of the friendly personal relations that have heretofore existed between us. Gentlemen, I trust you may never have reason to regret the action of this evening, and when the labors of the Forty-eighth congress are closed, you may be able to congratulate yourselves that no material interest of your party or the country has been injuriously affected by my administration of the office for which you have nominated me. In fact I may go a step further and venture to express the confident hope that every substantial interest will be advanced and promoted by the united efforts of the presiding officer and the Democratic majority on the floor. Such a result will insure victory in the great contests yet to come, and guarantee a long line of Democratic executives, with the honest, economical administration of our public affairs. But you have yet much other labor to perform, and again thanking you for what you have already done, I shall say no more.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

Secretary Teller's Report, Giving a Full Exhibit of the Indians and Public Lands.

THE INDIAN QUESTION.

Of the fifty-four pages of Secretary Teller's annual report, 20 are devoted to Indians, 6 to public lands, 3 to patents, 2 each to education and railroads, and 12 miscellaneously to geological surveys, Alaska, Utah, Yellowstone park, census, and government buildings. Much of the matter presented on the Indian question is threshed straw. It is interesting to note that—

The department has located an Indian school a Lawrence, Kans., to be conducted on the plan of Carlisle, Hampton and Forest Grove. The citizens of Lawrence donated to the government for the purposes of this school 280 acres of choice land in the immediate vicinity of the city, of the cash value of something over $10,000. The buildings are now in course of construction, and when completed will accommodate about 340 children. It is desirable to increase their capacity to 500. School buildings at Chilocca, Ind. T., and Genoa, Nebr., are about ready for occupation. The capacity of each of these schools is 150. It is proposed to establish boarding schools at Devil's Lake, Rosebud, and Sisseton, Dak.; Washakie, Wyo.; Wichita, Ind. T.; and Siletz, Oreg. Some of these are in course of erection. Secretary Teller reminds the country that the United States owes now, under existing treaties, $3,256,000 for Indian education, which government ought, but has not paid, and urges that now when there is a surplus of revenue, is a good time to make an appropriation. Of the Indian tribunals of three head men at each agency no adequate report is given. Crimes on reservations are yet without the necessary legislation from congress.

The commissioner of Indian affairs again calls attention to the persistent attempts made by Payne and others to invade the Indian Territory for the purpose of settlement, and recommends the enactment of a law adding imprisonment to the fine now provided for, in which the secretary concurs. The increase of Indian agents' salaries is recommended on the ground that better pay would command better men. The commissioner of Indian affairs recommends that a fund be placed at the disposal of the department to pay the fees of homestead entries by Indians, in which the secretary concurs.

THE SIOUX RESERVATION.

After recounting the failure of the Sioux treaty to meet the approval of the senate, the secretary continues:

"Whether the proposed payments are sufficient must be determined from the value of the land and the tenure under which it is held. It does not appear from an examination of the treaty of 1868 that it was the intention on the part of the government to recognize the whole of that vast tract of land called the Sioux reservation as the property of the Sioux alone, for it is provided that other Indians might be settled on the reservation with the consent of the Indians thereon; no provision is made for compensation for the land to be taken for that purpose. It appears to have been the purpose of the government in reserving that vast tract to secure to each Sioux Indian a piece of land for his personal benefit; for it is provided that the head of a family should be allowed to take not exceeding 320 acres, and others a less amount; out of the reservation these smaller pieces were to be carved. The amount of land stipulated to be given to the Indian is more than double the amount that is allowed citizens of the United States to take under the settlement laws. It is also provided in the treaty of 1868, that if the tract reserved was not sufficient to secure the required amount of land, other land should be added. There is also a provision that any male Indian eighteen years of age, of said tribes, may take a homestead of 160 acres anywhere on public land by residing on it for three years. It is further provided in the act of 1868 that, on the selection of land as aforesaid, the government will give to parties selecting the same seeds, agricultural implements, etc., to the value of $100 the first year, and $25 per year for three years thereafter; and that each person engaging in farming should receive $20 per year, or $10 more than if he continued to roam over the reservation. The treaty of 1868 provides that schools shall be maintained at government expense for every thirty scholars; also that the United States would furnish to each family that should commence farming one good American cow and one good, well-broken pair of American oxen. The treaty of 1876 provides that the government should erect comfortable houses for such of the Indians as should desire to farm. It is very evident that the great object in making the treaty was to induce the Indians to settle on farms and become farmers. But little effort has been made to comply with the conditions of these treaties on the part of the government. I have shown in another part of this report that there is due the Sioux, under the provisions for the support of schools, $1,401,600. The Indians have built themselves on the reservation 2,519 houses. The government should have constructed these houses, which the Indians have constructed substantially without government aid."

CROOK'S POLICY ASSAILED.

The familiar facts of the Apache outbreak are stated, and Gen. Crook's policy is thus commented on:

"Gen. Crook was given full charge of the police of the reservation, for it was not thought to be prudent to divide the responsibility of keeping peace on the San Carlos reservation, and the department was not willing to attempt to keep peace with the prisoners of war freed from military control. The condition is an anomalous one, and one that cannot long continue. It is quite certain that the presence of the prisoners among the agency Indians has been very demoralizing. These Indians are guilty of murders and other crimes, and subject to the laws of Arizona and New Mexico, where the crimes were committed. Gen. Crook says that they were not promised immunity for past offenses, but it is quite evident that they returned with the idea that they would not be punished for the crimes committed. It does not appear to be the duty of the department of the interior to determine whether these offenders should be punished or not. At this time they are prisoners of war, in the hands of the war department. If possible they should be removed from the agency to some point where there will be less danger of their escape, and where their evil influences will not be felt by the more peaceably disposed of the tribe."

In regard to the valuable coal lands found in the San Carlos reservation, Secretary Teller says: "It is competent for the president by executive order to reduce the reservation, and thus throw the coal fields out of the reservation; but it is not thought advisable to do so without compensating the Indians for the land so taken, for, as before stated, it will be very difficult to make them understand that they are not being robbed. Some compensation should therefore be provided before the land is sold. If the claims of the prospectors should be found to be correct—that is, that they were in ignorance of the boundaries of the reservation (the government not having established boundaries)—they ought to be allowed to derive some advantage from their work, either by being allowed to purchase at a reduced price or to lease for a term of years."

The recommendations for the Crow and Blackfeet reservations in Montana are as follows:

"This reservation is situated in the Territory of Montana and contains 7,364 square miles, or 4,713,000 acres of land. A large part of this is unfit for cultivation, but the very best of grazing land. These Indians should be located on the Big Horn, with a suitable reservation for agricultural and pastoral purposes, and the balance sold. At least 3,000,000 acres might thus be disposed of, leaving the Indians sufficient agricultural lands to become self-supporting, if they desire to become agriculturists, and a sufficient amount of grazing lands should they prefer to become stock-raisers. The 1,713,000 acres that would be left would give nearly, if not quite, 600 acres of land to each individual member of their tribes. The number of Crows has been estimated at 3,500; but it is quite certain that the number is much less, and probably not over 2,500 or 3,000. A portion of the money realized for such sale should be at once invested in a herd for the tribes, and cared for by the government until such time as the Indians shall be prepared to accept and care for their stock themselves. The proceeds, properly used, would make the Crows self-supporting in a few years at the farthest."

BLACKFEET RESERVATION.

"The number of Indians on this reservation is about 12,000. Until recently they have been able to support themselves largely by hunting, but the disappearance of the buffaloes is likely to cause great suffering among them during the coming winter and spring if an additional appropriation is not made for them.

Inspector Howard reports from Fort Belknap, on the 17th of October, 1883, that "for the first time in the history of the agency the buffalo has failed to visit that region." Heretofore the buffalo meat and hides secured by the Indians have been sufficient, with the limited aid given by the government, to give them fair support. If the Indians fail to secure buffaloes, as it is now quite certain they will, there is great danger of starvation among them. They must certainly starve unless they live off of the stock in the vicinity of the agency, but not on the reservation. If the Indians are driven by hunger to kill the cattle on the ranges belonging to herders who are rightfully in that section of country, there will be great danger of a collision between the herders and the Indians, and if such collision does not occur there will be a great loss of property, for the Indians will doubtless destroy more than they use. These Indians have a fine grazing country and some good agricultural lands that can be utilized by irrigation. A suitable appropriation should be made for their immediate wants, and provisions made for stocking the range with cattle, and they will become self-supporting from the growth of such herds."

THE LAND OFFICE.

The report of the commissioner of the general land office shows that the disposal of public lands under all acts of congress aggregates 19,430,032.81 acres, of which amount 339,235.91 acres were Indian lands, and 1,199,335.71 acres railroad sections under various acts of congress. The total cash receipts were $11,713,883.70, of which $625,404.37 was for sale of Indian lands. The increase in 1883 over 1882 was $3,319,867.66, and over 1881, $6,3 5,078.34; pre-emption and private entries, 4,465,665.49 acres; timber-culture entries, 3,110,930.23 acres; the number of homestead entries 56,565, embracing 8,171,914.38 acres. Not included in the lands disposed of, and in addition thereto, were 47,933 pre-emption filings, 4,999 soldiers' declaratory statements, and 10,232 miscellaneous filings. Four thousand two hundred and seventy-four contested cases were examined and acted upon during the fiscal year. The number of pre-emption cases undecided June 30, 1883, was 12,542, an increase of the number in arrears of 2,370, and 11,912 new cases were received for action. Considerable timber land was sold; but no land valuable for agricultural purposes has been offered at public sale.

In regard to fraudulent entries the report says:

"No difficulty is found where the parties making such fraudulent entries still hold the title, but in case there has been a transfer for a valuable consideration without notice of the fraud, great injustice is done to the purchaser by disturbing the title which he had no reason to suppose was fraudulent. If it is clearly established that the grantee in the patent had no existence, the title is held to be in the government, and the purchaser has no remedy except against the vendor, who is usually impecunious, and not infrequently has left the country. It would appear to be right that after a certain time the presumption should be conclusive that the patent was issued in strict accordance with law, and there should be no inquiry into the proceedings anterior to the time of issue."

In the matter of fencing public lands, a grievous affliction to small Texas cattle men, government is urged to take decisive steps to prevent rich capitalists from taking up the public domain, to the prejudice of poor men who want land.

RAILROAD EXEMPTIONS.

The subject of railroad taxation, in the cases where railroads lease their lands without taking a patent for them, and so escape taxation for local purposes and for the expenses of surveying, is covered by the following suggestion:

"It is earnestly to be desired that some means of adjustment of these grants, as a whole, be provided, or some method devised which shall, under cover of legislative authority, not only remedy the evil suggested, but enable this department to reach a finality as to the titles to be conveyed to these corporations at the earliest practicable moment, and thus relieve an anxious and excited public feeling, already sufficiently aroused upon the various difficult and complicated questions connected with the administration of this momentous and important branch of public affairs. To this end I most urgently recommend that the prompt and serious attention of congress be invited to the foregoing suggestions."

PENSIONS.

At the close of the last fiscal year there were 303,658 pensioners, as follows:

Army invalids	198,048
Army widows, minor children, and dependent relatives	74,474
Navy invalids	2,468
Navy widows, minor children, and dependent relatives	1,907
Survivors of the war of 1812	4,831
Widows of those who served in the war of 1812	21,336

There were added during the year 38,162 new pensioners, and 798 previously dropped were restored, making the total added, 38,958, an excess over the number added of 10,645. During the year 20,997 pensioners were dropped for various causes, leaving a net increase over the rolls of 17,961.

MISCELLANEOUS.

There were 35,734 applications for patents and trade marks, and 22,686 were granted.

In the matter of education the recommendation made is as follows: "In many of the States the school system is only lacking in efficiency on account of the lack of funds to support the schools provided for. In such cases it is believed that a liberal appropriation by the general government would so stimulate the State system that the States could be ultimately left to carry on the work without government aid."

The commissioner of railroads gives a detailed statement showing the condition of the sinking funds of the Union and Central Pacific companies, held by the treasurer of the United States under the act of congress approved May 7, 1878, from which it will be seen that on June 30, 1883, these funds amounted to $4,036,713.45; the Central Pacific having to its credit $2,404,015.86, and the Union Pacific $1,632,697 59. There are uninvested $858,532 to the credit of the Union Pacific, and $844,652 to the credit of the Central Pacific. The fund, says Secretary Teller, is a failure, and works hardship to the companies because so large an amount lies idle. On the Utah question, nothing new is announced. It is recommended that any laws proposed by the Utah legislature, be submitted to congress for approval. Game protection and strict police regulations, are urged for the Yellowstone National park. The speedy completion of the census is promised. Fire escapes are asked for the government printing offices and insane hospital. The whole number of patients in the Freedmen's hospital last year was 1,017.

THE CONGRESS.

Monday, December 3.

SENATE.—The senate was called to order at 12 m. by President Pro Tem Edmunds, and prayer offered. The president laid before the senate the credentials of re-election of Beck to succeed himself, of Palmer to succeed Ferry, and Pike to succeed Rollins. The oath was administered to Beck, Bowen, Cullum, Dolph and Ferry whose credentials were submitted at the last session. The customary resolution notifying the house and president that the senate was ready for business were agreed to and a recess of one hour taken. On reassembling the recess was extended to 3 p. m. At 3 the senate was again called to order, but there being no prospects of the speedy completion of house organization, adjourned. In administering the oath to senators the iron-clad oath was taken by Beck, Bowen, Cullom, Dolph, Frye, Hoar, McPherson, Manderson, Palmer, Pike, Plumb, Sabin, Saulsbury and Wilson. The remainder took the modified oath. The new senators are Pike, Kenna, Gibson, Colquitt, Wilson, Riddleberger, Sabin, Palmer, Cullom, Manderson, Dolph and Bowen.

HOUSE.—At 12 o'clock Clerk McPherson rapped the house to order and proceeded to call the roll of representatives. The roll call disclosed 316 members.

Nominations for speaker being in order, Mr. Geddes said: "I nominate for speaker of this house of the Forty-eighth congress Mr. Carlisle of Kentucky, a man acknowledged to be pre-eminently qualified for the place."

Mr. Cameron presented the name of Keifer of Ohio, and Mr. Lyman the name of Robinson of Massachusetts. Messrs. Harrison, Tucker, Reed and Calkins were appointed tellers, and the clerk proceeded to call the roll.

CARLISLE ELECTED SPEAKER.

The result was as follows:

Carlisle	191	J. S. Wise (Va.)	1
Keifer	112	Wadsworth (N. Y.)	1
Robinson	2	Lacey (Mich.)	1

The clerk declared Mr. Carlisle elected, and Messrs. Randall and Keifer escorted the gentleman to the chair. His entrance into the chamber was the signal for loud applause.

Upon taking the chair Mr. Carlisle said: Gentlemen of the House of Representatives: I thank you sincerely for the honor conferred upon me by the vote just taken. To be chosen from the membership of a body like this, to preside over its deliberations, is a distinction upon which any citizen may properly congratulate himself, and I assure you your kindness is fully appreciated. At the same time I realize the fact that the position to which you have assigned me is one of very great labor and responsibility, and while profoundly grateful for this manifestation of your confidence, I shall endeavor to discharge its duties with serious distrust of my capacity to meet in an acceptable manner the requirements of the office. I promise, however, to devote to your service all the zeal and ability which I am possessed of. Gentlemen, the maintenance of order on the floor is essential, absolutely essential, to the intelligent and systematic transaction of public business, and I earnestly invite your assistance in enforcing the rules adopted governing our proceedings. The large addition to the membership of the house resulting from the late apportionment of representatives makes this duty even more difficult than before, and without your cordial co-operation and support I cannot reasonably hope to discharge the ordinary daily duties of this office. That you will cheerfully co-operate with me in every proper effort to preserve order and facilitate the business of legislation I have no doubt. But, gentlemen, I shall ask something more than mere co-operation. Assuring you of my earnest desire at all times to be just and impartial, still I cannot expect to avoid mistakes, and shall be compelled, therefore, to frequently, no doubt, rely on the friendly forbearance of the gentlemen of both sides of the house.

I am sure, gentlemen, all matters of legislation presented to this congress will receive from you such careful consideration as the magnitude and character of the interests involved require, and your action upon them be wise, patriotic and conservative. Sudden and radical changes of laws and regulations effecting the commercial and industrial interests of the people ought never to be made, unless imperatively demanded by some public emergency, and, in my opinion, under the existing circumstances, such changes would not be favorably received by any considerable number of those who have given serious attention to the subject. [Applause.] Many reforms are undoubtedly necessary, and it will be your duty, after a careful examination of the whole subject in all its bearings, to decide how far they should extend, and when and in what manner they should be made. [Applause.] If there be any who fear that your action on this or any other subject will actually be injurious to any interest, or even afford reasonable cause for alarm, I am quite sure they will be agreeably disappointed. What the country has a right to expect of you is strict economy of administration in every department of the government, just and equal taxation for public purposes, faithful observance of the limitations of the constitution, scrupulous regard for the rights and interests of the great body of the people in order that they be protected, for congress has power to protect them against encroachments from every direction. Whatever can be done, under the circumstances surrounding us to meet this expectation ought to be done in more judgment. But, gentlemen, without detaining you further, I am ready to take the oath of office prescribed in the constitution and laws and proceed to complete the organization of the house. (Applause)

The ironclad oath was administered by Mr. Kelly, the oldest member in continuous service, and Speaker Carlisle called the house to order.

The roll of states was called and members came forward and took the oath and the house adjourned.

In last issue of the Chronicle, Mr. C. S. Hurlbert, of the elevator firm of Pillsbury & Hurlbert, has an attempt at an explanation of the course pursued by that company in its wheat buying operation which we suppose, is intended to convey the idea that that company is entirely innocent of any attempt to defraud or steal, claiming to be only one of several companies buying for the Millers' Association. We fail to discern clearly just how this "explanation" (that entirely fails to explain) will compensate our farmers who have lost their thousands of hard-earned dollars by false grading and false weights. Mr. Hurlbert says that the company is willing to investigate all charges of wrong and right them and in the same breath says his company is not responsible. He does not say that the Millers' Association does not cheat and defraud and wrong. He does not say that the M. A. is willing to correct the abuses that exist and the M. A. is the party we are after. He does seem to infer however that all the wheat buying companies are absolutely under the control of the M. A. and cannot go contrary to their orders—hence the inference is plain that they could not remedy the evil even granting they had any desire to break up a system that annually puts thousands of dollars in the pockets of the wheat-buyers, dollars wrung from the farmers by fraud and deceit. If the Millers' Association are as anxious to sustain a reputation as Mr. H. says the P. & H. Co., are, let them consent to an open wheat market. That is what the farmers demand and it is certainly not an unreasonable request. We have seen no evidences of any investigation into this matter by the Messrs. P. & H. Co. and if they are really anxious to do fairly as they say they are why do they not investigate the matter? Until they do so we must take his assertions with a large grain of allowance.

Grand Forks Herald: There is a general kick all over the Northwest against the elevator monopoly which has reduced the price of wheat 25 per cent, during the past month. Farmers in Dakota, Minnesota and Manitoba are goaded to exasperation. A telegram from Winnipeg says "the monopoly pretends that frozen wheat is not marketable, and therefore buy it at a nominal price, and sell it at the same price as the genuine article. Farmers have put frozen wheat to the test and sold the flour for home consumption at a price that gives them 90 cents for wheat instead of 20 to 60 offered by the monopoly. Farmers are organizing everywhere and banding themselves together for mutual protection.

An Independent Outlet.

Grand Forks Herald.

Had there existed this year an independent outlet to Duluth, for the moving of this season's crops, we should have been able to have exported, long before the close of navigation, the great bulk of the crop which now lies blockaded in the granaries of this district. It would seem to us that the promoters of the road already chartered for that purpose would find the present a favorable opportunity for seeking the aid of the people in carrying out their object. The people have now very vividly under their attention the effects upon their industry and income of an absolute dependence upon one monopoly, and while the impression is fresh, the promoters of this enterprise should come before them and ask their assistance in securing, at the earliest moment, the construction of a direct railway from Grand Forks to Duluth. We make no doubt that if the company will agree to construct the railway at an early period; to bind themselves to liberal transportation arrangements, free equally to all shippers, whether private or corporate; and to a maximum rate of grain freight of not more than eight or ten cents per bushel, giving satisfactory guarantees that these stipulations would be faithfully carried out, they would find every county in this district interested, ready to contribute liberally to the work of construction, by such bonuses as would enable the company to speedily and successfully put the road in operation.

The following petition has been handed us for the purpose of obtaining signatures, which, when obtained will be forwarded to the Governor. The petition may also be found at the postoffice and other public places. Every farmer should lose no time in signing so that the petition may be forwarded at once. Drop in and put down your name to the following petition.

To His Excellency, Lucius F. Hubbard, Gov. of Minnesota:

We the undersigned citizens of Minnesota, realizeing that the people are suffering grievous wrongs through the current system of grading and marketing wheat, call for the enactment of a law embracing the following essential features to-wit:

Providing for the election in each county of a Grain Inspector whos duty it shall be, either by himself or his deputies, to inspect all wheat marketed in his county for shipment Such Inspector to take an oath of office and to give proper bonds, and shall receive from the county proper compensation for services rendered. Inspector to be governed by the following rules: In determining weight, shall test in quantities of not less than standard half bushel, and all wheat weighing not less than 58 pounds to the bushel shall be graded No. 1 Hard or No. 1 straight according to variety, and weighing 52 to 58 No. 2, and less than 52 pounds to the bushel at No. 3 or rejected according to condition and quality. And in all cases the Inspector shall take into consideration the condition and quality of grain inspected. All grain too damp for binning shall be condemned as damp, and when properly dry may be inspected and properly graded. The Inspector in all cases to give to both seller and purchaser a certificate of grade: In all cases of shipment of wheat the shipper shall forward to consignee a certified copy of certificate of the local Inspector under penalties for false certification. Any changing of grade from that given by local Inspector, or mixing of different grades, except in grinding, to be prohibited under severe penalties.

We believe also that justice demands the enactment of laws establishing maximum rates on rail-roads and for taxing all lands belonging to rail-road corporations same as other lands

Believing that both justice and public sentiment call for laws embracing the foregoing features, or their equivalent, we respectfully petition your Excellency to call an extra session of the Legislature to that end, and that when convened you present this petition to the Legislature, together with your favorable recommendation: Hoping your favorable consideration, we remain your humble petitioners.

Philadelphia Bulletin: "Only a Farmer's Daughter" is a skillfully constructed and strong play, and as presented last evening, does not flag from the opening of the piece until the especially happy denouement in the last act. Not only is the plot full of interest, but the characters are well drawn, and offer opportunity for excellent acting. The company gave a careful and effective performance for the most part throughout, and the audience present were well pleased, and signified their approval by frequent applause. The Art Amateur for December is a number of holiday size and excellence. It contains working designs for a teapot (Japanesque decoration), a dessert plate (wild geranium,) a hand screen (shepherdess), embroidery (a fan, Christmas-card box, doilies, and mitres), repousse work (cockatoos and dolphins), wood-carving and jewelry; two beautiful designs of children, with minute directions for painting in oils and in mineral colors; an illustrated report of the Feuardent-Cesnola trial; a biography of Charles Sprague Pearce, with numerous original drawings; an illustrated notice of the Huntington gift to the Metropolitan Museum; reviews of the National and Pennsylvania Academy exhibitions, the Sketch Exhibition, and the National Exposition at Paris; dramatic and musical feuilletons; some fine illustrations of Derby porcelain,; practical articles on decoration, needlework and china-painting; correspondence, literary and editorial notes. It is impossible to speak too highly of the varied excellence of this superb publication. Price, 35 cents; $4 per annum. Montague Marks publisher, 23 Union Square, New York.

Peterson's Magazine for January reaches us in advance, and is altogether the most superb number we have ever seen, even of this favorite lady's-book. There are two beautiful steel-engravings: "In the Orchard," after a picture by Millais, and "Lost on the Alps," by the hardly less famous Riviere. In addition, there is a double-size fashion-plate, engraved and printed from steel and colored by hand; an exquisite affair. "Peterson" is now the only magazine that gives these fashion-plates. But the gem of the number is a colored pattern for a border for a curtain, or chair-stripe, etc., etc., perhaps the costliest single embellishment ever given in a magazine; as the publisher says, it would alone cost fifty cents at retail. This is presented to every subscriber as a New-Year's gift. There are, in addition to all these, more than fifty wood-engravings, illustrating the newest fashions, etc., etc. The literary contents are all original, and among them are several charming love stories, besides two new copyright novelets, one by Mrs. Ann S. Stephens, "Her Season in Washington," and another by the celebrated author of the "Second Life." The price of this popular lady's-book is but two dollars a year, with great deductions to clubs, and valuable premiums to the person getting up the club. Specimens are sent gratis, if written for, to those desiring to get up clubs. We advise no one to subscribe for a magazine until they have seen a copy of this one. Address Chas. J. Peterson, 306 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

The American Agriculturist For December.

closes the forty-second volume of this leading farm journal with a most excellent number. It contains over ninety fine original engravings by Forbes, Trumble, Folsom, Halm, and other artists. There are in all over one hundred original engravings, of which four are full-page, namely: "Home from the Wood-lot," "Typical Horses at the N. Y. Show," "Christmas Comes but Once a Year," and a truly beautiful first-page cover. Among the well-known writers are Dr. Geo Thurber, Orange Judd, Dr. B. D. Halsted, Prof. S. R. Thompson, M. C. Weld, J. M. Stahl, F. D. Coburn, D. M. Welday, Prof. A. J. Cook, W. D. Boynton, W. W. Meech, P. H. Jacobs, E. A. Long, M. E. Bamford, L. D. Snook, Mrs. G. Bush, Jr., Ethel Stone, Mrs. S. A. Elliott, and a long list of others. A Remodelled House; Hints on Hog Killing; Chinese Farming in California; Prize Poultry, and A Prize Sheep-Barn are a few of the very valuable articles presented. Mr. David W. Judd continues his Editorial Notes on many topics, with engravings. Miss Carr's touching Christmas story will be read the second time by many, both old and young. All of the several departments are unusually full, and we only wonder that so much costly reading matter, and so many fine engravings, can be furnished for the price ($1.50 per year) of this sterling journal of the Farm, Garden and Household. It should be found in every home.

North Dakota Farmers and their Legislators.

Grand Forks Daily Herald.

The present position of the farmers of North Dakota, prosperous and prospering as they are, is of the most exasperating and unsatisfactory character. The fact that after an exceptionally favorable season, crowned by a most abundant crop, garnered under most favorable circumstances, the farmers should find themselves with their granaries overflowing, and yet not be able to exchange the products of the soil for cash, shows an anomalous and unnatural condition of affairs. The immediate reason is not far to seek—it is too well known to all of us. A railway monopoly, an elevator monopoly, and a combination of flour manufacturers, all centering in Minneapolis, complete masters of the situation; all naturally interested and all working out a common policy of securing the grain yield of North Dakota at the lowest rate and selling it at the highest, sufficiently explains the grievance. The railway company, on one pretext or another, absolutely refuse to permit farmers or a combination of farmers to move their own grain to the most profitable market. The elevator and mill men refuse to buy, except at a grading which is a robbery on the farmers, and a price which is almost ruinous. Such farmers as cannot afford to hold over—the young settler whose whole investment is in his season's crop—find themselves crowded by their personal obligations, and are forced, by a combination of circumstances regulated by this ring in whose grasp they find themselves, to sell for what they can get, and to see the profits which they had fairly earned, swallowed up by this triple-headed ring of capitalists. In a word, the farmer who is not able by his own resources to evade the iron grasp of these conscienceless and relentless vultures, becomes in fact, if not in name, the serf, laboring not for himself but for the combination of plutocrats who control the situation.

Now, who is responsible for this state of affairs? The railway company and the millers have a monopoly which enables them to grind the faces of the struggling settlers; but they can not, any more than the poorest citizen, exercise any more privileges than the law and the law-makers give them.

These are matters which are to be seriously considered by our people, not with a view to lamenting over what they are compelled to endure, but with a view to a stern determination to help themselves, and an organized and united warfare upon the legislation on their statute books which suffers them to be robbed, and the legislators who placed that legislation there. What is the remedy? The only recourse which the people can have is, the election to the next legislature of the Territory of men whom they know be faithful to the farmers' interests, and who will go to Yankton or Bismarck, as the case may be, pledged to undo the work of their predecessors—pledged to the compulsion of the railway company to a fair fulfillment of its duties as a common carrier—pledged to the abolition of all its illegal tax exemptions, and the enforcement of payment of its fair proportion of the public taxes; and pledged to such a system of official rating of grain throughout the Territory, as will secure to every farmer, at his local market, the exact value of his products.

If the people exhibit apathy or indifference, or content themselves with crying out against their grievances, they may rely upon it the existing evils will remain with them. But if they pursue a bold, aggressive and intelligent course, they can, and we believe they will, enforce their rights, through constitutional and irresistible means. It is for them to say whether the next legislature of the Territory is to be composed of tools of these incorporated monopolies, some of them, it is believed, paid tools; or of men who can be depended upon to legislate to emancipate the people from their present condition of dependence, and show the monopolies with a strong hand that their charters make them the servants of the public, and not the masters of the people. Every voter has an interest in this matter, and a duty to do to himself and his neighbors. The duty, honestly and faithfully performed, will next year elect a People's legislature, instead of a set of tools for the monopolists, who throw a few sops to the people in the shape of public buildings built from their own money, and then rob them of millions for the benefit of their real masters.

OFFICIAL PAPER OF THE COUNTY.

CROOKSTON, THURSDAY, DEC. 6

County News.

St. Hilaire Packet.

From the Spectator.

Mr. S. W. Ritchie has a man employed hauling down wood from his farm near Thief River, which he intends shipping to Crookston.

The threshers are now busy grinding out the No. 1 hard on the other side of the river. The machines crossed over on the ice last week.

Mr. Alderman of Goodhue Co., Minn. is in town this week the guest of his son Mr. John Alderman. He is much pleased with our town and may locate here permanently.

The papers of the Valley, and especially those of this county, are complaining bitterly of the manner in which the farmers are being gulled by the Millers' association, and that there is reason for complaint no one who is acquainted with the facts will doubt for a moment. Nevertheless it does not seem as if these complaints will do much good, and it is plain that some more tangible means will have to be adopted to obtain redress from these greiveances. One paper suggests that the farmers organize a society to fight the Millers' association but in this county we have already an agricultural society which has enrolled among its members some of our best and most intelligent farmers. Heretofore their talents have been all devoted to getting up county fairs and horse races, it is true, but if the society would enlarge its field of labor, call a meeting, bring this matter up for discussion and when it is thoroughly understood in all its bearings, decide upon a line of action, and stick to it, it would soon become an agricultural society worthy of the name, and would receive the support and encouragement of every intelligent farmer in the county.

Fisher's Fancies.

From the Bulletin.

We regret to be informed of the death of one of the little children of Ole P. Krogen, of the town of Roome.

Sheriff Zwickey, who was in town on business, put in a pleasant time at the Thanksgiving ball.

Andrew Kleven's wife, town of Roome, presented her husband with a fine daughter on Friday afternoon, (yesterday.)

C. E. Southmayd, late of Fisher but now of Crookston, came down to attend the dance, and, like the gallant he is, of course brought a lady with him.

Among the many strangers at the dance on Thursday evening, we noticed the form of Mr. Dunc. Morris, of Crookston, accompanied by some of the belles of that city.

The dance at the Windsor House on Thursday evening last was one of the most successful affairs of the kind ever held in Fisher. A great crowd was present and kept up the merry time till nearly four o'clock in the morning. The supper provided at the Windsor House by Capt. Russell was certainly the best that has ever been gotten up on similar occasions so far, and was served up in that style which is a characteristic of our host. The thanks of the people of Fisher are due Capt. Russell for the pleasure he has afforded them more than once in a similar manner.

The Steenersen Bros. tried to get a car to ship their wheat in, but it was denied them. Why?. For this reason: The elevators will only allow these gentlemen No. 1 straight, but, upon sending the same wheat to Minneapolis, even the beautiful Millers' Association's inspector was obliged to concede it as No. 1 hard, and returned it accordingly. This did not suit the thievish ring, so they used their influence and prevented the railroad company from giving cars to private parties, because it does them out of their four cents a bushel robbery in the market price. So, summed up, it comes to this: First, the elevators give a lower grade and make seven cents a bushel that way, then they charge three cents for cleaning, and then four cents for "margin," thus robbing the farmer of at least fourteen cents on each bushel of wheat. Farmers, how long will you stand such tyranny? In England riots have been caused by less than this, and why should the farmers longer allow it? We do not counsel armed force, of course, but "empty stomachs cause empty heads," and the results may be such that the whole country may be stirred to its innermost soul by these frightful impositions. Farmers, unite; call your public meetings; agitate and turn the rascals out.

We said, and we still say, that the Millers' Association are a set of rogues, thieves, and vagabonds. Now, if this is not true, we should like to know why. The same rascals sent instructions to their agents, so we are credibly informed, to never give the price of No. 1 hard for any kind of wheat, as there was none in the country. They have had to take it all back, but still, they tried it on all the same. Again, how is it that wheat is four cents a bushel under the market price, even after allowing three cents for cleaning? Answer: Because what we say about the villainies of the M. A. is true.

Farmers, we are pegging away at the Millers' Association, and we mean to, but are you altogether without any? What right have you to be paying thirty dollars a barrel for your pork instead of raising it yourselves? Car loads upon car loads of this food is consumed in the northwest, and it is a standing disgrace to you. All that is consumed on a farm, excepting a few groceries, should be raised on a farm, thus making it almost self supporting.

Red Lake Falls Doings.

From the Messenger.

On Friday morning last, Rev. Fr. Champagne performed the ceremony of blessing the foundations of the new church. Owing to the short notice but few persons were present.

The Crookston Dramatic Company,—Amateurs, lately produced the play, "Above the Clouds," in such excellent style as to win general praise. Gentlemen from this place who witnessed it were very much pleased, and we understand that in all probability the company may be induced to visit the Falls and "give us a touch of their quality." If so, they will doubtless have a full house.

Miss Rosa Helm met with quite a serious accident last Sunday morning. She started to go down the outside staircase leading from the upper story, and slipping, fell the whole distance to the ground below. She was quickly assisted and Dr. Watson called. The injuries are a fracture of the left wrist, and a bad gash on the lower side of the jaw, beside general bruising. Dr. Watson reports her as doing well and she will probably be all right in a few weeks.

The Roller Mill is rapidly approaching completion and in anticipation of a rush of business, operations have commenced on the warehouse. It will be 32x100 feet, with 24 feet posts. It will stand about 10 feet east of the mill, and grain, bran, etc., will be taken into and out of the mill by conveyors. The warehouse will also contain a feed mill in addition to elevating machinery. A large driveway through the middle of the building will allow teams to drive through it and unload inside of the mill.

The material for the frame is now being gotten out, and work on the building commences at once.

So far, Crookston has fortunately escaped the ravages of that dreaded monster the Fire Fiend, but we know not at what hour he may appear in our midst. The only way to meet this terrible foe is by good, reliable Insurance. Look over our Million List of staunch, fire-tested companies and make your selection before you have cause to regret a loss.

Entered at the Post Office in Crookston as Second Class Matter

The Elevators and the Farmers.

Grand Forks Herald:

We publish elsewhere an apologetic circular from the manager of the Elevator company in which he disclaims any association with the mills of Minneapolis, for which they buy. We have to remind Mr. Hulbert that notwithstanding his denial, there is too strong a proof afforded by the every day experience of the people, of the existence of a large sized African somewhere in the palings, to admit of an unqualified acceptance of his attempt to repudiate connection with the millers' ring. If there is "no connection," all we have to say is, there is a most remarkable coincidence in the lines of policy pursued by the two associations, and that the practical effect of it is just the same as if the elevator men and millers' ring had actually conspired to rob and cheat the farmers. In fact we are compelled to believe there is a bug under the stone, and being satisfied it is there, it does not matter precisely what kind of a bug it is. Now let us ask Mr. Hulbert a few questions: How does it come about that the elevators are able to get cars for transportation which are refused to private individuals? How does it come about that at the elevators poor settlers, who have driven, may be 20 or 30 miles with their grain to market, are refused sale of their grain on the ground that the "elevator is full," while wealthy and influential people, whom it would not be so safe to outrage can always find room in the elevator, and the highest market price? How does it come about that the sidings along the railway are, to the knowledge of the elevator company, its agents and employees, crowded with empty grain cars, and yet they offer the excuse to farmers whose grain they refuse, that they can get no cars to move the grain forward from the elevators? Let us give the manager of the elevator company the benefit of a few further facts, and they are only a sample of the work which is going on all along the line. Not long since, at a town not far from Grand Forks, an extensive farmer having an exceptionally fine crop of grain, marketed 100 bushels, which in weight overran the measurement, as it came from the separator, by 107 pounds, which sufficiently shows the quality of the grain. He was allowed No. 1 hard rating and complimented on its superior quality. Three weeks later he sent a load of the same grain, from the same bin, to the same elevator, and the wheat was refused. On making enquiry on what grounds, he was told that it was "frosted." As the load was about to be driven home, another employee of this elevator came forward and offered to receive it as No. 3, and as it was near nightfall, the offer was accepted. The next load of wheat from the same bin, and of the same quality precisely, was driven to Larimore. Here the elevator agent purchased it, rating it as No. 2 hard. Now, where a shrewd, intelligent influential farmer has to put up with this kind of work, what does Mr. Hulbert suppose happens to the poor man who is forced by pressing circumstances to sell his grain for whatever is offered for it, or to the foreigners and othes who are comparatively ignorant of business and of the language? We can tell the elevator company that these men are robbed and plundered in the most gross, barefaced and shameful manner. Again, let us mention the case of a man near the same town, who corresponded with Milwaukee and other places, ascertained what he could sell there for, and that he could pay the cost of shipment, get a fair rating, and secure a handsome advance, after paying expenses, over what they would pay at the elevator at his home. He went to the elevator agent and inquired what they would clean and load his grain for at the elevator. He was told that they would ask three cents a bushel, but they would not undertake to forward it for three months. These things may be all simply adventitious circumstances; but we remark that the wheels of the machinery of the railway, the elevators and the millers' ring, work with a miraculous harmony, and if they had been cogged specially for simultaneous movement, the working could not have been more advantageously arranged. This is a suspicious age and a mountain of disclaimers from this elevator company will not serve to disabuse the suffering public of the conviction that there is a conspiracy on the part of all these agencies to defraud the farmers, so long as the existing outrageous and disgraceful impositions are continued.

The Pioneer Press, of Saturday last has the following letter from a farmer at Groton, D. T. We omit the newspaper clipping referred to because it is identical with the state of things existing here which has appeared in these columns frequently. The letter is as follows:

A Farmer's Complaint.

From the Pioneer Press.

Groton, Nov. 23.—To the Editor: An article in last Weekly Press says that C. P. Huntington spent $600,000 in the Washington lobby last winter. Poor man! Did he and other railroad moguls and monopolists, beggars and receivers of government favors, who use millions every year buying up our honorable congress like so many cattle, earn their money in Dakota raising wheat at 35 cents per below Minneapolis quotations for the same grade, knowing that it cost only 18 cents to put it there and then be called "agitators of the public peace," because we don't like it. Poor fellow! his wife will have to patch her old calico dress and his children live on sorgum and shorts until he raises another crop. If you publish this you may offend the monopolistic combination of millers, who apparently own you. It would not do to curtail their ability to make another big street parade when Villard comes around again and then drop on the price of wheat to get the expense back. Another article says the wheat buyers of Minnesota met to combine to keep down the price of wheat and keep out competition, prices to be set by the association (where they may pocket the whole cost of raising). You say they closed with a regular love feast. Of course they did and wash it down with champagne at the expense of the wheat raiser. The situation can best be shown by a cartoon representing monopoly holding farmers by the throat and kicking them for squirming, while the subsidized press stands in the background, laughing at the joke. Another article accuses farmers of sowing foul seed. Let a farmer raising 160 acres of No. 1 hard have hopes at harvest time of making enough out of his crop to buy an interest in a neighboring fanning mill, and when threshing time come the railroad magnates who are building up your town will show what you called business enterprise in a similar transaction a few weeks ago, viz, put up freight 15 or 20 per cent and refuse to furnish cars to any but regular shippers in the ring, as has been done here this season. Result: Instead of the farmer getting his mill, wheat goes down below the cost of raising, and he has to go without, while the same business transaction enables the association man to send his wife on a visit buy his daughter a piano, his son a fast horse, and himself a fast—almost anything he wants; and if he has more spare change he buys a few newspapers, builds up Minneapolis, lives high, and gets the reputation for enterprise, while the producers are but a carcass for jackals to feast upon. Dare you publish this, with the enclosed article from the Groton Advocate of this week, which is true, and can be proved both by commission men in Minneapolis and farmers on the Northern Pacific railroad?

A. M. SEVRENS.

To which the P. P. replies as follows:

The Farmers' Grievances.

We print elsewhere a letter from a farmer, which, though not written in either good temper or good taste, is worth a careful attention, because it throws a broad stream of light upon grievances of which the men who are the foundations of a nation's prosperity complain so bitterly, and at the same time disclose clearly enough why the remedy which they ask is so hopelessly slow in coming. The letter is written from Dakota, but the situation is practically the same as in Western Minnesota, and the whole subject may be treated with reference to the Northwest as a unit. We take it that the writer of this communication may not unfairly be made a representative of the class to which he belongs. If this is true, then it is obvious enough that there is reason why they are full of bitterness, and equally obvious that in their movements to secure practical relief they permit this bitterness to defeat the very object which is dearest to them and most closely identified with their future welfare. Dismissing the personal references to the people and the press of St. Paul and Minneapolis—from which, however, we shall have a moral to draw by and by—attention may first be directed to the fundamental cause of complaint. This is, in one word, monopoly. The farmer says that monopolies hedge him in, wherever he chooses to turn. By hard and honest labor he raises a crop which should not only cover the cost of subsistence, but return to him a margin of profit sufficient to enable him to make needed improvements, to pay for the land already bought or to purchase more, and to lay by something toward that little accumulating fund which it is the ambition of every right-thinking man to prepare for the uncertainty that is to come. His part is faithfully performed. The grain is raised and brought to market; but the market for him means only the nearest elevator. Here he is confronted either by a single monopoly, in the shape of a corporation which controls both railroads or elevators, or by a combination of the railroad and the millers' association and the price fixed upon his product is governed not at all by the price ruling in the great centers of free competition, but is put at such a figure as will mulct him of his profits, return him barely enough to cover cost of production, and transfer the margin to the pockets of those who have him at their mercy. He can take their price and go back to his hopeless work with a feeling in his breast akin to that which the Irish cottier cherishes, or he can resist the injustice and keep his product to rot on his hands; while he and his family, placed in the midst of plenty, are dwelling on the verge of pauperism. Against this tremendous hardship and wrong he cries to heaven, and wonders if the justice which we boast to be the guardian of the weakest and most defenseless in this land of ours has forgotten and denied him.

The pity of it is that too much of this is true. Without sharing in the delusion that all the forces of society and the state are in leauge against the farmer; without admitting anything of that dangerous theory that one man is any more entitled than another by virtue of his particular vocation to popular pity or legislative assistance; without sanctioning the ever-popular nonsense that whoever does not instantly concede that every grievance put forward is a real one, and that every remedy proposed belongs to him who asks it as by a species of divine right is an enemy of the farmer, it is freely admitted, as it is said to be notoriously true, that the farmers of the Northwest are handicapped in the race for independence; are subject to impositions which it is shameful that any man should be compelled to bear. It is not necessary to single out individuals, or to paint the finger at particular offenders, where the facts are so well known. The man, East or West, whose business is at the mercy of a single corporation, which in its turn is unrestrained as to the profits it may exact, has an unenviable lot. Facts such as those cited in this letter are not to be passed by lightly. If there were need they could be multiplied indefinitely; and it would be seen that not only the farmer, but the business man who establishes himself at a point where there is no competition in transportation, gives the heaviest securities to fortune. Freight rates are seldom imposed on a basis of a return to business enterprises. The ruling principle is to charge "what the business will bear;" and that means enough to leave to the farmer and business man a large margin, sufficient to build upon in hope and to prevent them from giving up in despair. There is this evil in the corporations which come into the closest relations with the industry of the Northwest. If, as has been asserted, it costs as much to transport freight from St. Paul to another point within the State of Minnesota as to carry the same commodity from Boston to St. Paul, then a grievous wrong is done. If the difference between the price of wheat at an elevator and the price at the point for which it is destined is double the cost of carriage between the two places, it is high time for interference. This statement of the case by what our correspondent calls the "subsidized press" ought to be frank enough to suit him.

U. S. LAND OFFICE,
Crookston, Minn., Nov. 19th, 1883.

Complaint having been entered at this office by Christopher O. Hagile against William H. Standish for failure to comply with law as to timber-culture entry No. 1,194, dated May 24th, 1879, upon the sw¼ Sec. 8, Township 147 n, of Range 45 w, in Polk County, Minnesota, with a view to the cancellation of said entry; contestant alleging that the said William H. Standish failed to plant ten acres of trees, tree seeds or cuttings on said land during the first four years after making said entry and that he has not now any trees growing on said land; the said parties are hereby summoned to appear at this office on the 4th day of January, 1884, at 10 o'clock a. m. to respond and furnish testimony concerning said alleged failure.

MORRIS R. BROWN,
Mortgagee.

JOHN McLEAN,
Attorney for Mortgagee. [27-33]

[First insertion Nov. 29th, 1883.]

MORTGAGE SALE.

DEFAULT HAS BEEN MADE IN THE condition of a certain mortgage, duly executed and delivered by Benjamin J. LaDuke and Mary E. LaDuke, his wife, mortgagors, to M. R. Brown, mortgagee, dated the 29th day of September, A. D. 1882, and recorded as a mortgage in the office of the Register of Deeds of the County of Polk and State of Minnesota, on the 2d day of October, A. D. 1882, at 1:30 o'clock p. m., in book "H" of mortgages, on page 299, on which there is claimed to be due at the date of this notice the amount of two hundred twenty-three 83-100 dollars ($223.83) and no action or proceeding has been instituted at law or in equity to recover the deb. secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof.

The said mortgage was duly assigned by an instrument thereof, duly executed and delivered by the said M. R. Brown to Joseph Kelso, dated the 23d day of February, A. D. 1883, and recorded in said office of the Register of Deeds on the 27th day of February, A. D. 1883, at 4 o'clock p. m., in book "K" of mortgage records, on page 262.

Notice is hereby given that by virtue of a power of sale contained in said mortgage and of the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the mortgaged premises therein described, which sale will be made at the front door of the Court House, in the city of Crookston, in the County of Polk and State of Minnesota, by the Sheriff of said county, on the 25th day of January, A. D. 1884, at 10 o'clock a. m. to satisfy the amount which shall then be due on said mortgage, with the interest thereon and taxes, if any, on said premises, and costs and expenses of sale, and twenty-five dollars attorney's fees as stipulated in said mortgage in case of foreclosure.

The premises described in said mortgage and so to be sold is the lot, piece or parcel of land situated in the County of Polk and State of Minnesota, and known and described as follows, to-wit: Beginning at a point fifty feet (50ft) east from the southwest corner of lot one in block forty-four (44) in townsite of Crookston, according to the recorded plat thereof now on file in the office of the Register of Deeds, thence at right angles northerly one hundred and fifty feet (150 feet) thence at right angles easterly and parallel with Sixth street fifty feet (50ft) thence at right angles southerly to the line of Sixth street one hundred and fifty feet (150ft) thence westerly along the line of Sixth street fifty feet (50ft) to the place of beginning, being 50 feet front on Sixth street by one hundred and fifty feet deep.

Sampson's roller mill is at work on grists. He grinds for one-eighth, which, at the market price for flour, shorts and bran makes a farmer's wheat worth $1.27 per bushel. Bring along your grists soon, as the mill will soon commence grinding flour for sale and will then only run half of the time on custom work. The mill will soon commence running night and day.

Of the Farmer's Daughter, that is to be presented at Ericsson's Hall on Friday evening, Dec. 21st the Philadelphia Times says: "Only a Farmer's Daughter," held the stage for two weeks at the Chestnut Street Theatre, Philadelphia where it achieved extraordinary popularity, and won much favor from the critics. The lateness of the hour at which the play terminated last night, renders impossible lengthy mention of its merits and deficiencies, but enough was seen to indicate what ti is. The story runs thus: "Harry Lennox weds, in the prologue, the farmer's daughter, Justine, the event occurring at the farm of her father, Mr. Marion. In the second act we find the young couple at home in New York, whither comes Mme. Laurent, an adventuress, and Phil Bartram, who ingratiate themselves into the friendship of the Lennoxes, the husband meantime having become rich and famous. They conspire to injure them, and Mme. Laurent fascinates Lennox into an intrigue with her and his wife, Justine, leaves him. The third act is the strongest, and the action is laid in a house in Poverty Hollow, whither Lennox, in a fit of madness, has wandered. Here comes after him Bartram and Mme. Laurent, and the latter is recognized by the woman who keeps the place, Mother Stark, as her own daughter. Lennox accuses her of breaking up his home, and a strong tableaux ends the act. In the last act the peculiarity of the plot is explained, husband and wife reconciled, and happiness brought on all.

Hon. Geo. Walsh, of Grand Forks, was in the city on Wednesday talking railroad strong. He says it is "build a road to Duluth or suffer the country to be busted by the millers' monopoly," and he is about right.

Tom Bjoin has just received a carload of those celebrated Stoughton Oscillating bob-sleds which are for sale at very low figures. Go and see Tom's bobs if you are intending to buy good ones.

Hon. Knute Nelson has already introduced a bill into Congress looking to the early opening of the pine lands on the Red Lake Indian Reservation, also to throw open a portion of said Reservation to settlement. Mr. Nelson shows commendable promptness in attending to the needs of his constituents.

Gazing upon the good looking features of lawyer John Ives last night, Bro. Wallace, of the Kittson County Enterprise, asked a bystander if that gentleman, (pointing to John) was not a noted divine of this city. Well, we will see, responded the Hon. H. Steenerson, and beckoning John to approach he introduced Bro. Wallace to Mr. Ives. Well, the laugh was on Bro, W. and only cost him the price of the sour apples for the boys but he opened the keg with grace and dignity.

Many of the JOURNAL patrons, while in to attend to court matters, have dropped in to cheer us by that little subscription and to bid us God speed in our efforts to procure an open, honest wheat market. To a man the farmers bid us to go ahead and promise us their hearty support in the good work. We are encouraged by these kind words and also the substantial tokens of regard and right here we wish to say to those who are way behind on subscription that we are preparing a statement of account of all such which we shall send around sometime before New Years day. The JOURNAL needs a supply of new type as that we now use has become worn out in the service of our readers, a few of whom have never as yet been called upon to contribute a cent. We ask as an especial favor of all who shall receive a statement of their subscription to us, promptly as their circumstances will permit, forward to us the amount due and thus aid not only us but themselves by enabling us to purchase a new dress for the JOURNAL. Trusting that our friends will all respond as cheerfully as we have faithfully supplied them we again extend our thanks to all who have been so true and valued friends of the JOURNAL.

52 Dividends a Year

FROM $3 INVESTED.

That is what any one will receive who subscribes for The Independent, of New York.

It occupies two fields. First, as a religious journal it is undenominational and broader than any sect. Its aim is to strengthen and extend Evangelical religion and to defend it against the attacks of Materialism, Atheism and unbelief. It is free to approve or criticise in any of the denominations whatever it believes is designed to advance or hinder the progress of the Gospel of Christ.

Amongst its religious writers are Leonard W. Bacon, D. D., S. C. Bartlett, D. D., Prest. John Bascom, Bishop Thos. M. Clark, Rev. Jos. Cook, Bishop A. C. Coxe, Geo. R. Crooks, D. D., Howard Crosby, D. D., Theo. L. Cuyler, D. D., Rev. Samuel Dyke, Geo. P. Fisher, D. D., Prof. Norman Fox, Washington Gladden, D. D., Bishop F. D. Huntington, Bishop J. F. Hurst, D. D. Morris, D. D., Prest. Noah Porter, Francis L. Patton, D. D., Philip Schaff, D. D., R. S. Storrs, D. D., Wm. M. Taylor, D. D., Wm. C. Wilkinson, D. D., Prest, T. D. Woolsey.

Second. As a literary journal it stands without a peer among the weekly press. During the past year it has published articles and poems by more than three hundred of the most talented writers in this country and Europe.

Among them Amelia A. Barr, Mary Clemmer, Rose Terry Cooke, Kate Foote, Dora Read Goodale, Rev. W. E. Griffis, "Grace Greenwood," Thomas Hill, D. D., William D. Howells, "H. H.," Sidney Lanier, Rose Hawthorne Lathrop, Louise Chandler Moulton, Joaquin Miller, R. A. Oakes, Mrs. S. M. B. Piatt, Josephene Pollard, Richard Henry Stoddard, Edmund Clarence Stedman, Mrs. Lazar Thompson, J. T. Trowbridge, Celia Thaxter, John Greenleaf Whittier, Sarah C. Woolsey, Susan E. Wallace, Wm. C. Ward and Prof. Charles A. Young.

The Independent will, within the next few months, publish stories by Wm. D. Howells, author of "Their Wedding Journey," "A Modern Instance," etc.; W. E. Norris, author of "Matrimony," "No New Thing," etc.; F. Marion Crawford, author of "Mr. Isaacs," "Dr. Claudius," etc; J. S., of Dale, author of "Guerndale," Edward Everett Hale, author of "Ten Times One is Ten," etc.; Julia Shayer, author of "Tiger and Lily, and Other Stories," Rebecca Harding Davis, Sarah Orne Jewett, Fred D. Story, Kate Upton Clarke, etc. etc. It is also negotiating with other distinguished story-writers of England and America, whose names it does not as yet feel at liberty to make public.

In civil and political affairs The Independent contends for sound ideas and principles. It believes in the reform of the civil service and tariff in the purification of politics, and maintains those principles which the highest ethics and best intelligence requires.

The Independent has 22 distinct departments 32 pages in all.

THE SUN.

NEW YORK, 1884.

About sixty million copies of THE SUN have gone out of our establishment during the past twelve months.

If you were to paste end to end all the columns of all THE SUNS printed and sold last year you would get a continuous strip of interesting information, common sense, wisdom, sound doctrine and sane wit long enough to reach from Printing House Square to the top of Mount Copernicus in the moon, then back to Printing House square, and then three-quarters of the way back to the moon again.

But The Sun is written for the inhabitants of the earth; this same strip of intelligence would girdle the globe twenty-seven or twenty-eight times.

If every buyer of a copy of The Sun during the past year has spent only one hour over it, and if his wife or his grandfather has spent another hour, this newspaper in 1883 has afforded the human race thirteen thousand years of steady reading, night and day.

It is only by little calculations like these that you can form any idea of the most popular of American newspapers, or of its influence on the opinions and actions of American men and women.

The Sun is, and will continue to be, a newspaper which tells the truth without fear of consequences, which gets at the facts no matter how much the process costs, which presents the news of all the world without waste of words and in the most readable shape, which is working with all its heart for the cause of honest government, and which therefore believes that the Republican party must go, and must go in this coming year of our Lord, 1884.

If you know The Sun, you like it already, and you will read it with accustomed diligence and profit during what is sure to be the most interesting year in its history. If you do not know The Sun, it is high time to get into the sunshine.

TERMS TO MAIL SUBSCRIBERS.

The several editions of The Sun are sent by mail, postpaid, as follows:

DAILY—50 cents a month, $3 a year: with Sunday edition, $7.

SUNDAY—Eight pages. This edition furnishes the current news of the world, special articles of exceptional interest to everybody, and literary reviews of new books of the highest merit. $1 a year.

WEEKLY—$1 a year. Eight pages of the best matter of the daily issues; An Agricultural Department of unequalled value, special market reports, and literary, scientific and domestic intelligence make The Weekly Sun the newspaper for the farmer's household. To clubs of ten with $10, an extra copy free.

PITH OF THE NEWS.

Washington News Notes.

Senator Hoar's bill provides for the use of patented ballot boxes and counting device. It requires that all balloting and counting of ballots be done in open meeting, which shall not be an adjourned until all the ballots are counted, and the result publicly proclaimed by the officer in charge, which officer shall be a United States marshal or supervisor, who shall be custodian of the boxes as a representative of the attorney general, who have primary charge and responsibility of such boxes.

The Chinese embassy comprises thirty persons and occupies two houses in the city. It is to be regretted that there is reason for believing that the one occupied by the secretary's clerks and servants is scarcely more reputable than those hells of San Francisco and New York known as opium joints.

Secretary Teller declined a patent lead mining claim to Kenneth M. Griffin of Central City, holding that in order to make it valid a location must have all portions of the lode contiguous without an intervening claim.

The first seat on the left of the vice president in which Mr. Windom had been a conspicuous figure, fell to the lot of Senator Sabin of Minnesota.

Work on the Potomac flats is progressing, with 225 men at work. The new ground is firm and shows no signs of ever having been the river bed.

Postoffices discontinued: Dakota, Reigstadt, Walworth county. Special service discontinued: Minnesota, Atherton, Isanti county.

The issue of silver dollars for the week ended Dec. 1 was $343,487; same time last year $802,000.

A delegation of congressmen asked Arthur to interfere in behalf of O'Donnell.

The Railroads.

The names of the roads and amounts involved in Mr. Payson's bill declaring land grants forfeited are as follows: Texas, Pacific (15,000,000 acres; California, Arizona & New Mexico; Goulf & Ship Island, Tuscaloosa and Mobile and New Orleans aggregating 15,000,000 acres); Savanna & Albany (involving 1,200,000 acres). Iron Mountain, Arkansas (1,130,000 acres); Memphis and Charleston (800,000 acres); Mobile & Grand (482,000 acres); Ontanonge & State Line (142,000 acres); Oregon Central (1,150,000 acres); Elyton & Bard's Bluff (800,000 acres); Oregon & California and California & Oregon unpatented lands (4,198,000) parts of the Northern Pacific from Walluto to Portland (2,500,000); New Orleans & Jackson (1,000,600); Iron Mountain, Missouri (601,000) part of the Atlantic & Pacific east of Albuquerque and west of Majava, (15,000,000).

The following railroad earnings are announced: Northwestern for the month of November, $2,357,800, an increase of $248,410; Central Iowa, $143,244, an increase of $34,230. Fourth week in November, Canadian Pacific; $117,000, an increase of $32,600. The Manitoba road reports a decrease of $52,000 for the fourth week in November, and the Omaha an increase of $27,000, and for the month an increase of $55,000.

The projectors of the road from Duluth to St. Paul have secured nearly all the right-of-way needed.

General News Gossip.

The weather during the month of November was for the most part such as the natives of the state delight to call "real Minnesota weather," and just the opposite of what the outside world is accustomed to regard as the normal condition of things in this part of the country. It is true there were two cold waves of keen and nipping quality that sent the mercury down to the vicinity of zero, and made business lively for the furriers for a few days. But on the whole, the month was an exceedingly mild one, the average temperature being 32.8 deg. or 3.2 deg. higher than the average of the last twelve Novembers. Notwithstanding this high average, the cold snaps referred to caused the freezing of the Mississippi at St. Paul as early as the 15th—a fact which the signal service reports as unprecedented.

Col. Boudinot has addressed a letter to Senator Dawes in relation to the published statement concerning the $22,500 said to be missing from the $300,000 Cherokee appropriation, in which he denies that the "story" originated in a quarrel between Boudinot and Phillips, and says he presumes that the senator and Secretary Teller have been slandered by Phillips' statement that the missing money was paid to them. He declares his belief that Phillips got all the money. He suggests that the senator's own sense of propriety should prompt him to ask an investigation, and says he is prepared to prove that Phillips made statements involving Senator Dawes and Secretary Teller.

Butte, Montana, has developed a full-fledged romance. James Sterling married Miss Mary Ingersoll at Bellevue, Ind., forty years ago. In 1853 he went to California, and for a few years sent letters and money to his family, but these finally ceased and he was mourned as dead. Believing her husband dead, Mrs. Sterling finally consented to marry Elijah F. Downing, but before the nuptials were celebrated she took the precaution of securing a formal divorce from Sterling. One of the sons, who went West, has found his father at Butte, who on the following day accompanied his son to his former home, where his wife wears widow's weeds for her second husband, who died recently.

There is bitter feeling in Groton, against George Avery, a thriving merchant, charged by Mrs. Giles Avery with having broken a marriage engagement. She says the wedding was to have occurred on the 6th but was informed by Avery that it was indefinitely postponed. Friday night a mob smashed Avery's store front, hanged him in effigy, and threatened to tar and feather him. On Saturday night he was again hanged in effigy, the latter remaining suspended all day Sunday. Avery denies the widow's charges. Warrants have been issued for the arrest of the leaders of the mob, and the case will be ventilated in the courts.

Lieut. Schwatka, in company with several other army officers stationed at the post in Washington Territory, has been making a military reconnoissance on the Yukon river, in Alaska, and there discovered a branch of the Dayay, which the lieutenant has named the Nourse river, after Prof. C. B. Nourse, of the naval observatory, whose various works relating to Arctic explorers are well known in this country and abroad.

Emerson & Brecke, clothiers of Chippewa Falls made an assignment on the 8th inst. Liabilities, $15,000 to $18,000; assets, not known. The principal creditors are in Milwaukee and Chicago. The firm had been in business less than ten months. There is quite a list of home creditors. The cause of the failure was lack of capital to start with, and slow trade this fall.

Five days of last week were occupied at the Devil's Lake Indian agency in issuing supplies, aggregating in retail value $10,000 to the ten bands of Sioux Indians; clothing, dry goods, boots and shoes, stoves, hardware, etc., being paid the Indian farmers in settlement for work performed by them.

William T. Addis of Boyne City, Mich., has made an assignment to Nut A. Norton. Addis was engaged in lumbering and railroading. His assets and liabilities are equal, about $75,000.

By executive order the consolidating of the internal revenue districts is revoked as applied to the Wisconsin districts. That State remains unchanged.

A rich Cleveland widow while decorating her husband's grave met a rich widower, similarly engaged, and the cards are out for the wedding.

Ohio's wheat acreage for next season is estimated 2,626,579 acres, or 97 per cent. of that of 1883.

United States deputy marshals at Mobile have been suppressed by the courts.

Albion, Mich., has a flourishing female brass band.

The Criminal Record.

Rev. J. C. Campbell, fifty-five years old, pastor of the Hopewell Presbyterian church at Fair Harbor, Ohio, has been suspended and will have a church trial. Jessie Graham, a fair-haired member of the church, says he was in the habit of coming to her house when her father and brother were away, and one day put his arms around her waist and forcibly hugged her and kissed her and asked her to sit down on his lap. A dozen women are ready to testify to their own experience with the reverend Don Juan.

An attempt was made recently to assassinate Col. H. M. Green of Lawrence, Kans., superintendent of the state imbecile asylum. Three shots were fired into his sleeping-room, one passing very near him. Several weeks ago a similar attempt was made to shoot him. An attempt was also made to burn the asylum. These three acts are doubtless the work of one man. The motive assigned is revenge.

Albert Thomas, a negro, was arrested at Clinton, Miss., by a posse of citizens for committing a rape on the little daughter of B. F. Lingon, a prominent citizen. While conveying him back to the neighborhood of the crime he attempted to escape, and was riddled with bullets.

Near Anderson, Ind., John J. Johnson was shot by Coleman Hawkins and dangerously wounded. After the shooting Hawkins returned to his home and shot himself, dying instantly. Both were wealthy farmers. The trouble arose from a dispute about a ditch between their farms.

George Barnstable, under fourteen years sentence at Waukegan, Ill., for rape on his fifteen year old niece, has disappeared leaving his bondsmen to pay $2,000 bail. He is worth $30,000.

James M. Underwood, for the murder of Robert J. Pendergrass, a wealthy planter of Yell county, Ark., was hanged recently at Dardelles, Ark., in the presence of 3,000 people.

About a dozen of horse thieves have been hanged recently in southeastern Nebraska. They are supposed to be the remnants of Doctor Middletons' gang.

A coroner's jury at Jamaica, L. I., rendered a verdict of wilful murder against Theresa Branderstein, a German girl who strangled a new-born babe.

Frank Barnard, a prominent Philadelphian, has fled, leaving heavy debts.

The Casualties of the Week.

The Steamer Alaska run down the pilot boat Columbia, off New York, and all on board were lost. The names of the pilots were Christian Wolfe, Thomas H. Metcalf, Ralph H. Noble and Charles Arnold. The boat keeper was William White; cook, John Fortblade. The crew of four men, foreigners were shipped for the cruise.

Severe shocks of earthquake on the 6th at Rounden Springs, Ark., which lasted forty seconds, broke glassware in crockery stores and houses. Large rocks were loosened and fell in the cuts of the Kansas City, Springfield & Memphis railroad, near by. The shock was accompanied by loud noise and violent jar of the earth. It moved northwest to southeast.

A Kansas Pacific passenger train was snow-bound thirty-six hours on the way from Kansas City to Denver on the 6th inst.

Personal News Paragraphs.

Miss Amy Van Dyke, the daughter of S. J. Van Dyke, a real estate agent in New York, left her home four months ago, ostensibly to visit a sister in Cleveland, but it turns out that she was enticed from home by a young stock broker, who took her money and jewelry and deserted her. A few days ago her father received a letter from a gentleman who said he had seen the missing girl at a theater. Mr. Van Dyke came to Milwaukee and was successful in discovering his daughter and inducing her to return home.

Rev. William H. Hoyt, one of the assistant priests at St. Ann's Roman Catholic church, New York, was stricken with apoplexy while saying mass on the 9th inst. Father Hoyt was in the act of pronouncing the prayer of absolution when he fell heavily to the floor. He was seventy years old, and was formerly a Protestant Episcopal clergyman.

William A. Vanderbilt presented to Mrs Van Duzer, an aunt, and sister to his mother, a large piece of property at Stapleton, Staten island, where the Van Duzers lived at the time the late Commodore Vanderbilt married into the family, and where they have made their home ever since.

E. M. Hewins, J. W. Hamilton, A. J. Day, S. Tuttle, W. H. Bennett, Ben Miller, Maj. Durman, E. W. Payne, and Charles Edrid, big cattle men, have secured a lease of 6,000,000 acres of the Cherokee nation at an annual rental of $100,000—one and two-thirds cents per acre.

Mrs. John Heinrich of Minneapolis, the lady who was accidently shot in a Pullman car near Little Missouri a few weeks ago, has so far recovered as to be able to resume her journey toward the Pacific coast.

Wheeler H. Peckham, recently appointed district attorney of New York city, has resigned on account of ill health. Peter B. Olney has been appointed his successor.

The Tribunal of commerce, Paris, has sentenced Sarah Bernhardt and her husband jointly to pay 125,000 francs to a gentleman who stood part security to Mayor of the Gaity theatre, London, Sarah Bernhardt having broken her engagement.

The Constantinople Conflagration.

Constantinople cablegram: A tremendous conflagration has visited the capital of the Turkish empire. Six hundred houses, the principal Greek church and four synagogues were destroyed. A snow storm was prevailing at the time of the fire, which added greatly to the sufferings of the thousands made homeless. It took the hardest efforts of the fire department, totally inadequate for an emergency of this kind, to subdue the flames. The government is relieving the great distress of the sufferers. The burnt district is a portion of Stamboul. It is mostly inhabited by Turks and Jews, and the houses, built of wood and being old, were very inflammable.

DOINGS OF CONGRESS

Tuesday, December 4.

SENATE.—There was a perfect avalanche of bills in the senate, numbering, exclusive of joint resolutions, 250. Many of them were reintroductions of old measures, among which were Senator Lapham's and Senator Edmunds' Utah bills, which failed last session; Senator Williams' bill to create a bureau of animal industry, Senator Buck's bill to remove political disabilities and open the army and navy to participants in the late rebellion, Senator Hoar's Lowell bankruptcy bill and others. Senator Ingalls introduced a bill to grant arrearages of pensions to all pensioners, without reference to the time when an application is made. Senator Edmunds introduced an elaborate measure providing for the establishment of four trunk lines of postal telegraph; also a civil rights bill, not only guaranteeing equal rights to all citizens, but declaring any acts of States or decision of any courts to the contrary to be invalid and void, which is the object of the bill. Senator Logan introduced two measures, one to equalize the bounty of the volunteer soldiers, and another to pension the prisoners of war. Mr. Sherman introduced a bill to allow the banks to issue circulation, equal to 90 per cent. of the market value of the bonds deposited for security. Mr. Morrill introduced a bill to stop the coinage of the silver dollar. Senator McMillan introduced a bill to ascertain the amounts due to citizens of the United States for supplies furnished to the Sioux and Dakota Indians of Minnesota subsequent to August, 1860, and prior to the massacre of August, 1862, and providing for the payment thereof.

HOUSE.—The democratic nominees for minor offices were elected and sworn in. A committee, consisting of Curtin, Blackburn, and Hiscock, was appointed to wait upon the president and inform him that the house was organized and ready to receive whatever communication he was pleased to transmit. The business of drawing seats was proceeded with.

The Minnesota delegation got seats together near the speaker's desk. Washburn, Wakefield and Strait are seated in a row. Knute Nelson got a seat in the row behind Mr. Washburn, and selected a seat for Mr. Nelson. The drawing over, the house got into another election case wrangle, which was finally postponed, and the president's message was begun.

Wednesday, December 5.

SENATE.—After yesterday's avalanche of bills in the senate it was thought that these pests were disposed of for some time; but as soon as the chaplain finished to-day there were cries of "Mr. President" from all parts of the chamber by senators anxious to serve their constituents. Consequently another torrent of bills, the majority relics of the last session, was poured upon the secretary's desk, exceeding that of yesterday. For nearly two hours this business was continued.

Mr. Morgan offered a resolution, which was agreed to, instructing the committee on Indian affairs to inquire into the expediency of creating a military academy west of the Mississippi river, for training and educating Indian youths and men up to a proper age, as soldiers, and to admit them when qualified into the regular army.

HOUSE.—Mr. Randall objected to the passage of a resolution for the immediate appropriation of $20,000 for printing the records of the United States supreme court, and it was referred to the committee of the whole. He said all deficiencies should have a thorough investigation, not only by the house, but by an appropriate committee. He had a horror of deficiencies. The Virginia contested election case, Garrison vs. Mayo, was referred to the committee on elections, when appointed, with instructions to report the legal questions involved therein. It was ordered that when the house adjourns tomorrow it be to meet Monday.

Mr. Jones submitted the customary resolutions announcing the death of Representative Thomas H. Herndon (Ala.), and out of respect to the memory of the deceased the house adjourned, with the understanding that no business will be transacted tomorrow.

Thursday, December 6.

SENATE.—Mr. Ingalls introduced a bill to repeal the pre-emption and timber culture laws, and amend the homestead laws. By Mr. Cameron (Wis.) to restore to the market certain lands of the United States in Minnesota and Wisconsin, and authorize their sale subject to right of flowage. These are lands withdrawn from sale in 1880 and 1881 with the idea that they would be required for use in the construction and maintenance of dams, reservoirs, etc. proposed to be erected for the improvement of the Mississippi river. They are by this bill made subject to private entry and sale at $1.25 per acre. By Mr. Morgan, proposing an amendment to the constitution by which the president will have power to disapprove any item in an appropriation for rivers and harbors while approving other items. A large number of minor bills were introduced.

HOUSE.—Mr. McCold took the oath of office and the house adjourned until Monday 10th inst., to allow the speaker time to prepare the committees.

Monday, December 10.

SENATE.—Mr. Cameron of Wisconsin introduced a bill regulating elections for members of congress.

A resolution of Mr. Voorhees was agreed to authorizing the committee on military affairs to inquire into the expediency of purchasing encampment grounds occupied by the revolutionary army at Valley Forge for a national park. He also offered the following which he asked to have printed:

Resolved, That in the judgment of the senate, the public debt is not a public blessing, and any measure of financial policy looking to the perpetuation of the present interest-bearing national debt for purposes of national banking or any other account meets the disapproval of this body, and should be viewed with alarm by taxpayers of the United States.

HOUSE.—An immense number of bills was introduced, the following being the principal ones: Repealing the pre-emption and timber culture laws; amending the homestead law; preventing undue discrimination in railway transportation; declaring forfeited land grants to the Northern Pacific, Houghton & Ontonagon, North Wisconsin, St. Vincent extension and Brainerd branch, Hastings, & Dakota and other railroad companies; appropriating $6,000,000 for Mississippi river improvement; establishing maximum rates of fare on the Union Pacific and Central Pacific railways; abolishing the postage of second class matter and reducing drop letter postage to one cent; putting salt and agricultural implements on the free list; regarding the presidential succession; for a civil rights amendment to the constitution; appropriating $25,000,000 annually for common schools, for a postal telegraph; prohibiting special legislation; a prohibition amendment to the constitution; relieving the merchant marine; repealing internal revenue laws; limiting the disposal of public agricultural lands to actual settlers; granting women suffrage; repealing the silver dollar coinage act; removing taxes on national bank circulation and fixing the amount of such circulation. The call of states was not finished. A resolution was adopted calling the attention of the president to the case of Patrick O'Donnel.

Something of a breeze was raised just before adjournment, when Mr. Hewitt of New York asked unanimous consent to offer a resolution asking the president to request the English government to delay the execution of O'Donnell's sentence until the facts in relation to his trial could be inquired into, and it could be ascertained whether or not O'Donnell was an American citizen, and whether he had been tried in accordance with English and international law. The resolution was passed without discussion and without dissent.

A Scientific Victory.

From Longman's Magazine.

It is interesting to note the wondrous change that has taken place, in the popular estimate of the Darwinian theory. It has been well said that a new theory has often to run through three different phases. In the first place, every one exclaims that the theory is not true; then it is urged that the theory is contrary to religion; and, lastly, that everybody knew it long ago. The great doctrine of natural selection promulgated by Darwin has run through these courses. At its publication it was received with an outburst of incredulity among the unthinking part of the community. Every one recollects the denunciations it received and the ridicule which the new doctrine had to encounter. But the theory of Darwin has survived that stage. It has also survived the attacks of those who denounced the theory as contrary to religion. The truth inherent in the principles of Darwin has quietly brushed aside such opposition, and now we hear but little of it. The funeral of Darwin at Westminster Abbey must be regarded as marking a momentous epoch in the history of thought. That the great doctrine would one day be accepted was a necessary truth, but I do not think that any one who recollects the publication of the "Origin of Species" could then have anticipated the enormous change in educated opinion which the next quarter of a century was to disclose. Still less likely would it have seemed that the whole nation would have so far acknowledged Darwin that with one accord they demanded that his remains should be interred in the national mausoleum.

The Princess Beatrice is the favorite child of Queen Victoria, and many say that she is, in fact, the real Queen of England, as her mother delegates a great deal of authority to her.

ABOUT THE STOMACH.

We dare say three-fourths of the diseases that prevail in the human family are directly or indirectly induced by some derangement of the stomach. The most serious ailments have their origin there. With dyspepsia the food passes indigested through the lacteal vessels and many particles of deleterious matter are carried into the blood and gain lodgment often in the lungs and other great centers of vitality. Hence dyspepsia favors the occurrence of consumption in persons at all predisposed to it. It is also the primary source of scrofula and other diseases of the blood and skin.

The person who has a pig-pen appetite one day and can eat little or nothing the next has dyspepsia. The person who feels a heaviness at the stomach after eating, accompanied with a gulping-up of wind and sour particles of food, has dyspepsia. Besides these symptoms are bad taste in the mouth, pain in the chest, shortness of breath, palpitation, headache, giddiness, coldness of extremities, languor, sleeplessness and despondency.

In prescribing Burdock Blood Bitters as a cure for dyspepsia we desire the patient to eat regularly a reasonable quantity of good, plain food (not too hot or too cold) and to use very sparingly of tobacco (if addicted to that habit,) which is apt to exhaust the organs of salivation. Dyspepsia is a disease of the mucous membrane lining the stomach. If the patient will treat this mucous membrane of the stomach with any sort of decency, ceasing to aggravate its sensitive surface with indigestible matter, we guarantee the use of Burdock Blood Bitters will cure him. That's all we ask. Give the stomach a fair chance, Burdock Blood Bitters will do the rest. Thousands of testimonials. Burdock Blood Bitters by all druggists. Foster, Milburn & Co., M'f'rs, Buffalo, N. Y.

The reason why so many die with consumption, is because they neglect to use the proper remedy in season. When the system is first attacked with a cough, oppression of the chest, or seated pains in the breast, Allen's Lung Balsam will cause the phlegm to raise, heal the irritated parts, and restore the system to health.

The Dow Agricultural works, Peru, Ind., has failed for $35.

Remarkable Escape.

John Kuhn, of Lafayette, Ind., had a very narrow escape from death. This is his own story: "One year ago I was in the last stages of consumption. Our best physicians gave my case up. I finally got so low that our doctor said I could not live twenty-four hours. My friends then purchased a bottle of Dr. Wm. Hall's Balsam for the Lungs, which benefited me. I continued until I took nine bottles. I am now in perfect health having used no other medicine.

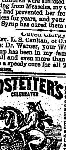
Cured Clergymen.

Rev. L. S. Caultan, of Circleville, Kansas, says: Dr. Warner, your White Wine of Tar Syrup has been in my family and found to be all and even more than you claim of it. It is a speedy cure for all Throat and Lung diseases.



HOSTETTER'S CELEBRATED STOMACH BITTERS

As an invigorant, Hostetter's Stomach Bitters has received the most positive endorsement from eminent physicians, and has long occupied a foremost rank among standard proprietary remedies. Its properties as an alterative of disordered conditions of the stomach, liver and bowels, and a preventive of malarial diseases, are no less renowned.

THE MARVELLOUS SINGING DOLL.

This charming novelty is advertised in this issue, and certainly nothing will appeal more quickly to the children than a Doll that will sing a song. The price is very reasonable, the Doll is a beautiful affair, and the ingenious singing attachment will delight the young and amuse the old. The little girl who finds a Webber Doll "in her stocking" at Christmas time will be the envy of all.

Dear Sir: The beautiful Singing Doll came safely, and far exceeded my expectation of what a Singing Doll could be. Our little folk were charmed with its beauty, but when it sang, their delight was unbounded. It will be to them a thing of beauty and a constant joy.
Sincerely yours, Rev. J. B. ABBOTT.

ALLEN'S
Lung Balsam!
A GOOD FAMILY REMEDY!
—THAT WILL CURE—
Coughs, Colds, Croup,

Dr. Meredith, Dentist, of Cincin'ti, was thought to be in the last stages of Consumption, and was induced by his friends to try Allen's Lung Balsam after the formula was shown him. We have his letter that it at once cured his cough and that he was able to resume his practice.

CONSUMPTION

Jeremiah Wright, of Marion County, W. Va., writes us that his wife had Pulmonary Consumption and was pronounced incurable by their physician, when the use of Allen's Lung Balsam entirely cured her. He writes that he and his neighbors think it the best medicine in the world.

CONSUMPTION.

Wm. C. Digges, Merchant, of Bowling Green, Va., writes April 4, 1881, that he wants us to know that the Lung Balsam has cured his mother of Consumption, after the physician had given her up as incurable. He says others knowing her case have taken the Balsam and been cured. He thinks all so afflicted should give it a trial.

Wm. A. Graham & Co., Wholesale Druggists Zanesville, Ohio, write us of the cure of Matthias Freeman, a well-known citizen, who had been afflicted with Bronchitis in its worst form for twelve years. The Lung Balsam cured him as it has cured many others of Bronchitis.

THE MARVELLOUS WEBBER SINGING DOLL.

"A PRIMA DONNA IN EVERY HOME."

A Mechanical Wonder.

Last year we first introduced this CHARMING NOVELTY to the children of America and it is safe to assert that no Toy ever devised attained such immediate popularity; fully aware of its merit we had thousands of Dolls ready for the Holiday trade notwithstanding which the supply was exhausted early in December, and hundreds of children who came to our store were disappointed. We have been accumulating stock for the past nine months and shall endeavor this year to fill all orders the day of receipt. The Doll has been improved in every way since last year. Instead of the stuff German body as in all imported Dolls our Doll has an AMERICAN MADE BODY with limber joints so that it will sit easily and gracefully in any position. The arm is of Finest Kid with separate fingers. These are positively the finest bodies ever put in a Doll, they are of graceful and natural shape, and much better and more expensively made than the best imported bodies which they will out-wear many times. The Waxen Heads with long hair are of the best French and German make, made especially for this Doll and they are as beautiful as life, long hair, beautiful eyes and delicately tinted cheeks. We consider them the finest Doll's Heads ever imported into this country, and that without the Wonderful Singing Attachment THE DOLL ALONE IS WELL WORTH THE ENTIRE PRICE. THE SINGING ATTACHMENT is concealed within the body, it is one of the most ingenious inventions of the age. Its shape and location are shown in the right hand engraving. It is a Perfect Musical Instrument, finely made, not liable to get out of order and so arranged that a slight pressure causes the Doll to sing one of the following airs: "Home sweet home," "Greenville," "I want to be an angel," "There is a happy land," "Sweet bye and bye," "Bonnie Doon," "How can I leave thee?" "A B C Song," "America," "Thou, thou reign'st" (German), "Frohe Botschaft" (German), "Tell Aunt Rhoda," "Buy a broom," "Yankee Doodle," "Coming thro' the Rye," "God bless the Prince of Wales," "Grandfather's Clock," "Child's Song," "Last Rose of Summer," "Joyful Message" (German), "Old Folks at Home," "Pop Goes the Weasel," "So many Stars" (German), "Sleep my Child" (German), "When I a little bird," "Cradle's Empty," "God save the Queen." Walking and talking dolls have long been made, but they are expensive, soon out of order and do not afford the little ones half the pleasure and entertainment that our Wonderful Singing Doll does, which is the Greatest Novelty in CHILDREN'S TOYS EVER PRODUCED and is the most beautiful and appropriate present that can be made to a child. We can furnish three sizes No. 1, 22 inches high, price $2.75. No. 2, 24 inches high, larger head price $3.25. No. 3, 26 inches high, OUR BEST DOLL, price $4.00. These Prices include Boxing. All three sizes are equally perfect and complete, but the larger the doll the larger the singing attachment and better head. Sent to any address on receipt of price; fine embroidered Chemise 25 cts. extra. THE TRADE SUPPLIED. Address all orders to THE MASSACHUSETTS ORGAN CO., No. 57 Washington Street, Boston, Mass., U. S. AT LAST.

BY AUSTIN DOBSON.

How weary 'twas to wait! The year
Went dragging slowly on;
The red leaf to the running brook
Dropped sadly, and was gone;
December came, and locked in ice
The plashing of the mill;
The white snow filled the orchard up;
But she was waiting still.

Spring stirred and broke. The rocks once more
'Gan cawing up a loft;
The young lambs' new-awakened cries
Came trembling from the croft;
The clumps of primrose filled again
The hollows by the way;
The pale wind-flowers blew; but she Grew paler still than they.

How weary 'twas to wait! With June,
Through all the drowsy street,
Came distant murmurs of the war
And rumors of the fleet;
The gossips, from the market stalls,
Cried news of Joe and Tim;
But June shed all her leaves, and still
There came no news of him.

And then, at last at last, at last,
One blessed August morn,
Beneath the yellowing autumn elms,
Pang-panging came the horn;
The swift coach paused a creaking space,
Then flashed away, and passed;
But she stood trembling yet, and dazed;
The news had come—at last!

And thus the artist saw her stand,
While all around her seems
As vague and shadowy as the shapes
That flit from us in dreams;
And naught in all the world is true,
Save those few words which tell
That he she lost is found again—
Is found again—and well!

THE LOST TRAIN.

At 7 o'clock in the evening, on the 29th of August, 1881, there stood on the railroad platform of the little station of Silver Bow seven persons. Silver Bow is a new settlement on one of the numerous branches of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe railroad. Twenty miles southwest of Silver Bow, on the same track, is Lone Tomb. A like distance beyond this place lies Blue Canyon, and still farther Golconda City, where the line terminates. Five of these persons had bought tickets for the Atlantic express. They were waiting to take the momentarily expected train for Topeka, there to change cars and reach New York by way of Chicago. The remaining two individuals were the ticket agent and a telegraph operator.

On the platform at Lone Tomb were a dozen persons, among them a party consisting of a bride and groom, just married, and a mysterious stranger, dressed in a long, black cloak and a slouch hat, who glanced furtively, from time to time, at the happy pair. The train from Blue Canyon came slowly into Lone Tomb, and the passengers soon took their seats, the bride and groom going into the parlor-car, and the mysterious stranger entering the smoker. There were a few interchanges of courtesies between the loiterers on the platform and the conductor, brakemen and engineer, then the bell of the locomotive rang, and the train moved on the single track toward Silver Bow.

There was not a great deal of traffic on this branch of the Atchinson, Topeka & Santa Fe. But two trains ran daily, Sundays excepted, through the seventy miles of wild but fairly level country that had occasionally been well traversed by the James boys and other desperadoes, for the United States express car often carried in its safe a large amount of specie. The train that had just left Lone Tomb was known as "No. 67." It consisted of a Pullman palace parlor sleeper, a smoker, an ordinary passenger coach, a baggage car, a United States express and a caboose. The conductor, Jem Harris, was an Antietam hero, favorably known throughout Kansas, Colorado, New Mexico and Texas. The engineer, Tim Tiernan, enjoyed equally as much popularity, not solely on account of his good nature, but also for his skill in the game of poker. In remote regions such as these the arrival and departure of the train is, outside of an occasional lynching, the only excitement and the trainmen are looked upon very much as were the driver and guard in the old coaching days in England.

"We're twenty minutes behind time," said Conductor Harris to Engineer Tiernan. "Shake her up, Tim; we'll get to Silver Bow by 7."

The seven persons on the platform at Silver Bow toward 7 o'clock looked anxiously up the track for "No. 67," but there were no signs of it; 7:15 o'clock, and still the well-known whistle, which could be heard often at a distance of three miles, had not echoed through the thickly-wooded hills. This was not unusual, for "67" had been at times half an hour late. As the Silver Bow travelers were beginning to get impatient, the telegraph operater wired to Lone Tomb and asked at what time the train left. The answer soon came:

"No. 67, in charge of Harris left here for Silver Bow at 6:20. Fair load."

"Well," remarked the the ticket agent who was in charge of the station, "she must be along in a few minutes now."

The passengers were satisfied and content to wait. They walked up and down the platform and rested occasionally on their trunks and baggage, which were piled up ready to be deposited in the baggage car of "67."

It was now eight o'clock and almost dark, without any indication of the approach of the train. Those who before had been impatient now became alarmed, especially the step-mother of the bridegroom, who, with his father, intended accompanying the young people as far as Topeka, as neither had been able to be present at the wedding. The telegraph operator at the request of the ticket agent, wired once more to Lone Tomb as follows:

"No 67' not yet arrived. What's wrong?" Lone Tomb replied:

"Must be all right; perhaps hot box. Good night—going home."

"It is nine o'clock," said the ticket agent to the tired and anxious persons on the platform, as he looked at his watch; "something must have have happened, but I don't think it can be anything serious. A piece of machinery may have got out of order and Tim Tiernan's repairing it. I guess '67' will turn up by and by in good shape." The ticket agent talked in this way to keep up the spirits of the others, but it was easy to see by his forced jollity that he did not like the looks of things. "What can have happened?" he muttered to himself. "She can't have jumped the track or jumped into the little creek—or have the James boys got aboard, stopped the train and shot Tim Tiernan? If anything of the sort has taken place it would be at least another hour before we could hear of it here or from Lone Tomb."

At 10:15 the ticket agent came to the conclusion that a serious mishap had befallen the train and resolved to organize a party to go up the track toward Lone Tomb and learn the cause of the detention. The first thing he did was to send to a neighboring mining camp two miles away to get the services of the sheriff and some of the miners to aid him in searching for the train and render him the necessary assistance. Within less than an hour twenty resolute men, headed by the sheriff and the ticket agent, started for Lone Tomb. They were all well armed and a dozen of them carried lanterns. The telegraph operator and the step-mother and father of the expected bridegroom behind and made themselves as comfortable as they could under the circumstances. They knew that several hours must elapse before any tidings of the train could reach them. The night was dark and cloudy and only occasionally was the faint glimmer of a star visible through the overhanging firs that grew in rich luxuriance for a mile or two along the track, forming an avenue of plumed ghosts with bowing heads.

When the party had proceeded for about a half an hour without seeing any trace of the train, it stopped to rest and discuss the situation. The men looked at each other as well as they could in the blackness of the wood, and for a few minutes no one spoke.

"Well," at length said the sheriff, as he rested his rifle on one of the rails of the solitary track, "I guess this is the James boys' work. We may have to fight after all. Who knows but they may have murdered everybody on the train and got away with all the treasure in the safe? It's rough across country, and it's almost certain they'll come this way. Keep a sharp lookout, boys; we may catch 'em We'd better travel in military style. Advance guard, main body and rear guard."

"Perhaps it ain't the James boys at all," said a weather-beaten, red-headed miner. "The train may have tumbled over a bridge or down a ravine. Let us look on both sides of the track as we go along and——"

"That isn't very likely," interrupted the ticket agent. "This branch is as well built as any line in the west. The rails are steel and the road is ballasted with rock. The two bridges on it are thoroughly substantial and the creeks they cross aren't big enough or deep enough to hold a horse car, much less a whole train. Besides, there isn't a ravine worth talking about within 200 yards of the track."

"Let's go along, boys, and keep our eyes open," said the sheriff; "It's of no use staying here chinning."

As the ticket agent had stated, the track between Lone Tomb and Silver Bow was a good one and beset with few dangers. It is true that there were several sharp curves, but the trains always went slowly round these. There was one bridge that crossed a shallow stream another spanned a small mountain torrent, and above a cutting through the rocks, about seven miles from Lone Tomb, was a natural arch, formed by bowlders in by-gone ages lodging in the narrow gorge. These were the only parts of the road where an accident might be likely, but at the same time highly improbable.

The night crept on and the party reached the first bridge. The gentle ripple of the stream fell on their ears as the lanterns were held close to the track. The rails, ties and frogs were all intact. The parapets were in perfect condition. No train could have possibly run off the track there. Some of the men plunged into the dense undergrowth among the willows near the water and swept the scene with the lurid light of their lanterns, which flashed in the woods like huge fire-flies. The brook, for it was nothing more, flowed silently on. No railroad disaster had disturbed its limpid calmness.

"We've got to keep on, boys," said the Sheriff, with an air of painful assumed cheerfulness. "We'll have '67's headlight blazing down on us yet. She can't be far off now. We're only nine miles from Lone Tomb. We'll soon know what the trouble is.'

No one had anything to add to the sheriff's remarks, so the weary, and, so far fruitless march was resumed.

"Hanged if I don't think," exclaimed the red-bearded miner, stopping suddenly, "that them James boys has ditched the train by putting logs on the track and we'll find the wreck before we get to One-tree bridge."

One-tree bridge was so called because a huge pine stood like a sentinel close to the small but petulant mountain torrent that the structure crossed. Again the lanterns were swung over the water. Again the party scattered among the trees and searched carefully for traces of the missing train and its passengers, but without the smallest measure of success.

"Guess I've had about enough of this," said the ticket agent. "Let's go back again; the company don't pay me to walk twelve or fourteen miles to look after its trains."

"Well," remarked one of the party, who had but little to say, "we've come so far, we may as well see it through. The thing ought to be followed up. Something very unusual has happened, and it is our duty to find out what it is. Who knows but we may yet come upon the corpses of all who were aboard that train."

"Oh, it ain't going to be as bad as that," said the Sheriff, "but anyhow it's of no use going back; '67' must be close at hand, and then, when we've found out what the trouble is, we'll all have a nap at Lone Tomb and take the morning train for Silver Bow. We shall fetch up in time for breakfast."

"What licks me," the red-bearded miner blurted out, "is why some of them Lone Tom fellows ain't found their way here before this."

"They hadn't any reason to," observed another miner, who carried very conspicuously two six-shooters, "as the accident's happened up their way. But do any of you know what the time is?"

There was an immediate pulling out and examination of watches, and then several voices chorused:

"Half after three."

"I didn't think it was so late as that; let us push on, boys."

The gloom which had hung over the party like a pall during the earlier part of the march gave way to lightness of spirit and jocularity. The terrible fate which had probably befallen seventy or eighty human beings was apparently lost sight of for the moment. Whiskey-flasks received attention. Cigars and pipes were lit, while various theories were advanced to account for the non-appearance of the missing train. One man suggested that it was taking a journey through the air attached to special balloons, another that it had been blown up with dynamite by Nihilists, a third that the track had caved in and that "67" was running through a private tunnel of its own. The red bearded miner seemed to think that the train saw the Sheriff coming and had run round into the woods to get out of the way.

"You may joke away, gentlemen, as much as you please, but in my opinion it's no joking matter," said the ticket agent, gloomily. "Here is this single track. That train left Lone Tomb at 6:20 o'clock, and it hasn't got as far as this yet, and it is now nearly 4 o'clock. Where can it be? There are no precipices over which it could tumble. We don't know what horrors may be in store for us. I'm almost sorry I didn't go back; this long and anxious tramp has played me out."

It was the dark hour before daylight, rendered doubly gloomy by the high rocks on each side. The track curved sharply here as it entered the narrow gorge with the natural arch of bowlders. No disaster to a train had taken place on this spot. The track, the ties and everything were found to be in perfect condition. The detention, from whatever cause, must have occurred near Lone Tomb. The mystified and tired searchers became absolutely desperate with disappointments. The air grew cold and a light rain began to fall. The walking, too, was difficult, owing to the thicket on both sides of the track, the tangled underbrush and felled trees.

"We shall soon know the worst," said the sheriff, who had been a soldier, "but we may as well do the right thing up to the handle. We'll form in extended line, so that we can cover some of the ground in these woods, although I don't see very well how a train could get there, anyway."

The line was formed as suggested, just as the fine streaks of dawn appeared. The ground was carefully examined, the prickly branches of the underbrush tearing the clothes of several of the party. Now the track again turned abruptly, and then came open and very level country, with wooded purple hills in the distance, looking shadowy in the dim, gray dawn. The regular order of march was once more adopted. There was no longer any conversation; everybody felt exhausted. Suddenly there was a loud cry. It was a shout of unmistakable joy.

"Hurrah! I see her. I see the light—the headlight of Tieran's locomotive."

"Where?" all asked at once.

"There right ahead on the track as straight as you can look," answered the red-haired miner, who had made the discovery. "What the blooming blazes can he be doing there?" he added.

"I'll be shot if I can see any blamed headlight."

"Why, sheriff you can't help seeing it," said the ticket agent. "Just follow my finger."

"Oh, I've got it now."

Everybody saw it and felt elated in consequence. The long tramp was forgotten. The light loomed larger each minute through the gray morning mist. The party no longer walked hurriedly; their object was achieved. There would they find the train still on the track, without having been rifled by the James boys. It was probably some trifling accident to the locomotive that Tim Tiernan was waiting for daylight to repair. The whole crowd could now run back with Conductor Jim Harris to breakfast at Silver Bow. And what a splendid joke was this hunt for "67." It would be in all the newspapers and written up by the professional humorists and cause no end of fun. The now light-hearted wayfarers walked briskly on. They "spurted a little," as there was some distance yet to go before coming up to the gleaming headlight. Indeed, the outline of the train could not be distinguished clearly in the early morning darkness, the misty atmosphere making the light on the open and level country appear nearer than it really was.

"Well, boys," the Sheriff said, "this may be the last time I have occasion to address you as a body. I think we all ought to be proud of our work. We've stood the rain, the cold and the tramp without flinching, and I'll see that the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe takes care of us."

"Let's get it over as soon as possible. What d'ye say to a run?" suggested the ticket agent. "We've been walking all the time."

"Good!" was the response from a dozen husky throats.

"A run be it, then!" exclaimed the Sheriff. "Forward? Double quick!"

The whole party set off toward the light at a high rate of speed. The now damp earth resounded with the quick, measured step of the courageous little band. The headlight was at hand. Another couple of hundred yards and they would reach it. The runners breathed hard, but there would be rest in a minute or two. Hurrah! the red-bearded miner is the first to disappear in the mist ahead of the others. He must be on the train by this time. The sheriff is a good second. There was a deep growl of disappointment. The light from the fixed kerosene lamp with bright reflector threw its rays over the excited men and the bare railroad track, and they looked up and read by the faint daylight the legend, "Lone Tomb," above the platform of the station.

Heavy Brains.

According to the notion that the size of the brain bears a general relation to the intellectual capacity of the individual, Cromwell and Byron might be regarded as having possessed the greatest minds known since the practice of testing the mind by the weight of the brain came into vogue, But, unfortunately, the reported weight of their brains 82 and 76 ounces respectively, is not accepted as correct by physiologists, and so until now the famous naturalist Cuvier, Dr. Abercombie and Dr. Duputyren have been regarded as having possessed the largest brains on record their weight being 64, 63 and 62 1-2 ounces respectively. But now they must yield the palm to the Russian novel writer, Ivan Tourguenoff. At the post mortem examination made in Paris by four well-known French surgeons, Bourdeilke, Descou, Paul Segond and Manien, it was found that Tourgenoff's brain weighed 71 1-2 ounces. The surgeons say it was in a healthy condition. Tourgenoff's brain outweighed the brain of the ordinary man by 22 ounces. In the list of the heavy weight brains, James Fisk, Jr. leads the American, being credited with 58 ounces of brain; next comes Daniel Webster whose brain, however, weighed only 53 1-2 ounces. According to his cranial capacity Webster ought to have had 63 3-4 ounces of brain.

Land Along the Canadian Pacific.

From the Inter Ocean Interview.

"What is the character of the country along the line of the Canadian Pacific?"

"Generally speaking it is good, although there is, of course, much land in the plains which does not possess very great value. For a considerable distance west of Winnipeg, although the land is very rich, there is but little under cultivation, in consequence of the unfortunate fact that it has been all secured by speculators who are holding for an unreasonable advance. You are, this road, like other new roads is made to suffer by this disposition to speculate in lands rather than to improve them. From Portage la Prairie, which is fifty-six miles west of Winnipeg, to Brandon seventy-seven miles further, the country is well settled, and especially in the immediate vicinity of the two towns named is under a high state of cultivation, showing extensive fields of as fine wheat and oats as I have ever seen anywhere. Settlers are opening farms along all the numerous streams which are crossed or followed by the road. I was surprised to find excellent wheat, oats and rye growing in the valley of the Bow river, 840 miles west of Winnipeg, almost within the shade of the Rocky mountains. Not only grain but very nearly all the leading vegetables can be grown successfully all along the line."

The first lodge of Freemasonary in the west, was established at Lexington, Ky., on November 17, 1788.

FIELD AND FARM.

Cooking Recipes.

Old fowls may be made delicious eating if they are thoroughly boiled, an hour for each year of their lives, then stuffed and baked, being basted with the liquor in which they were boiled. A goose is better to be first parboiled before being baked.

HOW TO COOK OAT MEAL.—Take a teacupful of oat-meal, a quart of water, and a little salt, put in a pail and set on the stove where it will keep warm, but not cook, about half an hour, then put it in a kettle of water or steamer and boil an hour. Dilver asked for a recipe, and I think she will like this one, for it is very simple.

GOLD CAKE.—One-third cup of butter, one and one-half cups of sugar, yolks of four eggs, one cup of cold water, three cups of flour, two teaspoonfuls of baking powder, and lemon to taste. It is very nice baked in a shallow tin and frosted with chocolate.

WHITE CAKE.—One-half cup of butter, two cups of white sugar, one cup of sweet milk, three cups of flour, three teaspoonfuls of baking powder, and the whites of four eggs. Flavor with lemon extract.

CORN-STARCH CAKE.—One cup of white sugar, one-half cup of butter, one-half cup of sweet milk, one cup of flour, one-half cup of corn starch, the whites of three eggs, and two large teaspoonful of baking powder.

CHRISTMAS CAKE.—Mother used to bake a Christmas cake in the shape of a basket, which pleased us very much. Perhaps some of your readers may like to make one also, so I will tell how it was done. Any kind of cake will answer. Ours was baked in a five quart pan which was flaring in shape. After the cake was poured in the pan, a quart bowl that slanted the same as the pan was buttered on the outside and set in the middle of the cake, and a large potato washed clean placed in the bowl to weigh it down. When done, the bowl was carefully removed and the cake frosted inside and out. A strip of pasteboard two inches wide and long enough to slip the ends under the cake and have it arch over like a handle, was covered with white paper, and sprays of evergreens tacked on. Then it was placed on a large plate, the handle adjusted, a wreath placed around the base, and then filled with candy, nuts and raisins.

Farm Notes.

Linseed meal if fed in small quantities—not over a pint of feed twice a day—will add a richness to milk, and flesh, or rather fat, to horses.

The building of cheap silos may yet become as common as colonels and generals in Kentucky.

I venture the assertion, that nine times out of ten, when farmers have tried to raise trotters, they have failed to sell for enough to pay the extra expense.—Maine Farmer.

It stands partly to the credit of sorghum sweets that in various places throughout the country, "any number of glucose factories, costing from $50,000 to $1,500,000 each" (and which formerly lived by lying, "are now lying idle."

Mr. C. M. Clay, White Hall, Ky., shares the growing suspicion of canned provisions which frequent cases of serious illness, if not of death, traced directly to their use—especially of meat—naturally tend to foster. He rightly says, in The Germantown Telegraph, that "putting fruit in tins mixed with zinc, lead and solder, is sure poisoning," and he maintains that the only certain safety is in use of glass.

It is a matter of fact well known to all honest men and women, that drunkenness, gambling, theft, cussedness, and all the evils that tend to demoralize and corrupt, are easily found within the borders of the fair grounds, says a writer to the Indiana Farmer; and it is also a matter of fact that this evil element is drawn to the fairs largely through the influence and love of gambling and horse-racing. These evils walk hand-in-hand, and are in their nature inseparably connected, and are regarded by all right-thinking persons as the open enemies of good order and good society. But the friend to racing says there is money in it. Money to whom? we would ask. Money to the farmer? No. Where is the man whose purse has been permanently and substantially filled by horse-racing and gambling? Echo answers, "Where."

Large and Small Barns.

Written for the Manchester Mirror.

While I would not build a large barn to outdo my neighbor, I would never advise any man to multiply small ones. Why? First, convenience in storing hay, etc. Second, caring for stock. An hour in "doing chores" in a large barn, well arranged, is worth more than two in several different barns, not to take into account the difference in oversight one may have over boys and hired men in their manner of treatment and fidelity in care of stock. Third, expense. The larger the enclosed space the less rate per foot of cost of storage, and to this I will add height. One great item of cost is in shingles or slate. It costs no more to cover a roof over of a 20 or 24-foot posted barn than one 12 to 14 foot. With the arrangemnent of an "up-stairs driveway," without which no barn is fairly endurable however costly or well arranged otherwise; it is also easier to unload in a deep bay than in a shallow one and the capacity of storage is far greater, as the hay settles so much more solidly. "'Tis solid as a shtone, sir," an Irishman said, on leaping on my mow in winter. Many barns hereabouts are made with a driveway just above or in line with the scaffold over the stables. This is like the one-half loaf, "better than no bread." No barn need be set where a greater rise than the height of posts is required to enable one to have a driveway on a level with the beams overhead, and most barns may be so set as to get more or less side-hill advantage, But even from a level it is not a great job to grade up 13. 1s, or even 16 to 18 feet. Such a job once done is done for all time, that is the lifetime of that barn; and who will say that it is not cheaper as well as easier once for all than the everlasting pitching up by human muscle all the fodder crops of the farm? Leaving the labor point out for a moment, how often may a few tons of hay or loads of grain be safely stored by this method, because the help may be getting loads ready in the field instead of "mowing away" just before a storm. This, in a single season, will frequently more than pay the entire cost of the driveway and grading. I speak from experience, having been the first on Rancolph Hill (though not in town) to adopt the plan, and having induced others to do the same, some of whom have since told me a thousand dollars would not be any inducement to go back on the old ground floorway.

Stumbling Horses.

The Pittsburg Stockman, in a recent issue says—Some good horses are addicted to stumbling while walking or moving in a slow trot. A well-versed veterinarian states that there are two causes that would tend to produce this faulty action; one a general weakness in the muscular system, such as would be noticed in a tired horse the other a weakness of the exterior muscles of the leg, brought about by carrying too much weight on the toe. To effect a cure, he adds, lighten the weight of each front shoe about four ounces; have the toe of the shoe made of steel instead of iron, it will wear longer; have it rounded off about the same as it would be when one-third worn out, in order to prevent tripping; allow one week's rest; have the legs showered for a few minutes at a time with cold water through a hose, in order to create a spray; then rub dry, briskly, from the chest down to the foot. Give walking exercise daily during this week for about an hour twice a day. When you commence driving again omit the slow jog, either walk or send him along at a sharp trot for a mile or two, then walk away, but do not speed for at least several weeks. By this means the habit of stumbling from either of the above causes will be pretty well overcome.

How to Behave at a Party.

I remember that when I was quite young, going to a party was nearly as much a trial to me as a pleasure. Being diffident; I dreaded entering the room, and encountering the eyes of the people already assembled there; and once fairly in, I was overshadowed all the evening by the dreadful necessity of by and by retiring. Besides, I felt a sense of responsibility which was very oppressive, and was so afraid of not doing or saying what was expected of me that I moved and acted awkwardly, and no doubt looked perfectly miserable.

Perhaps some of you may have had experiences similar to mine. Now let me tell you that I have lived to laugh at my foolish shyness, and to be very sorry for boys and girls who suffer from the same thing. When you are invited to a company, the first thing in order is to reply to the invitation. This is polite, whether you accept or decline, and it is imperative if you decline. Send your answer as soon as possible, in some simple way such a phrase as this: "Harold," or "Florence," thanks "Mrs.——for her kind invitation for Thursday evening, and accepts it with pleasure," or "declines it with real regret," as the case may be. Arrived at your friend's house, you will be directed to the proper place for the removal of your wraps and the arrangement of your toilet, and then you have only to proceed to the parlor, where your hostess will relieve you from embarrassment by meeting you at once. She is, of course, the first person whom you are to greet. Having spoken to her, you are at liberty to find other friends. Do not think that people are looking at you, or noticing your dress or your looks. They are doing nothing of the kind. Engage heartily in whatever amusement is provided for the occasion, but do not put yourself needlessly forward. If spoken to, reply modestly but intelligently, even though for a moment there be a hush in the room. If you really wish to enjoy yourself, seek out somebody who seems more of a stranger than yourself, and try to do something for his or her pleasure. Forget you are not acquainted with everybody, and remember that it is your duty to help your hostess in making her party a success. Should your greatest enemy be present, you must of course, be perfectly civil and agreeable in your manner to him, for in your friend's house you are under a flag of truce.

When you say good-night to your entertainers be sure to thank them for the pleasure you have had. Do not stay too late but avoid being the first to go; or, if you must leave early, do it as quietly as possible, lest your withdrawal should be the signal for others to leave, thus breaking up the party too soon.—Harper's Young People.

Artemus Ward in New Orleans.

"What was the question, Colonel, you wished to put to friend Brown?" said the proprietor, whose ruddy countenance shone with pleasure.

"Well, simply this; partly for my own satisfaction and partly to answer those who have asked me the question. Pray, Mr. Brown, did you fight against us during the war?"

This was uttered in all sober earnestness. We felt that it was out of place; and yet we couldn't help admiring the Colonel's genuine honesty and simplicity of purpose and feeling.

Artemus' eye twinkled, though his face was composed and his manner serious, as he answered: "Since I came south, Colonel, I have been frequently asked that question. Permit me to answer it in my own fashion." He drew himself up and folded his arms. We drew closer around him, anxious to hear the humorist for once express himself seriously.

"I did my duty faithfully, Colonel, by sending a substitute to the war. I have never met him since. Doubtless, he will yet return to his family's bosom to draw a pension in my place. I was therefore excused from further active service. But I always openly proclaimed it!"—here he was exceedingly impressive—"that as long as General Lee kept away from me I would keep away from him; I would never go after him. But I said, nevertheless, repeatedly and without concealment, that if ever General Lee and his 50,000 came marching up into Nor'west New York state, where my old mother and I lived on my humble homestead, and General Lee was to order his 50,000 men to attack my homestead, I did say as I said before, that I would send my old mother to the rear; and I would take down my grandfather's old musket, and I'd load her up with buckshot, and then I'd send General Lee word; and if he and his 50,000 men didn't retreat, I would attack every man of them, and follow them to the Potomac! And you see, colonel, General Lee must have heard of this, for he never came near me!"

Amid the burst of laughter which followed, he departed, and I never saw him again.—Manhattan Magazine.

Concerning the Welland Canal.

Few Americans have any idea about the Welland Canal. I looked at this new achievement of the Canadians last week. The old canal was a towpath concern and did not admit a steam tug coincident with the vessel. The new canal has fourteen feet of water when there is high water; but in the summer drought it is said to be less than fourteen feet. It is a magnificantly constructed work, and excites surprise that Americans should have permitted Canadians to anticipate them. Yet it will be observed that the facilities for this canal through Canada are much better than through the United States. The axis of the two lakes, Erie and Ontario, passes through Canada; the Niagara river issues from the extreme eastern end of Lake Erie while Lake Ontario, overlaps Lake Erie considerably in Canada. It is rather startling to see moving through the apparently solid ground, for the country is very high where the New Welland Canal is built, tall, massive ocean steamers, full rigged ships, etc., sometimes as continuous as a caravan across the desert. They go along silently, not a sound or whistle escaping them, and the visitor sometimes thinks his mind is deceived and that the landscape is haunted.—N. Y. Tribune.

Very Wicked Blondes.

"Do you mean to say that complexion affects character?"

"Yes, its more than skin deep. It permeates the entire system, and the mind and soul are as false as the physical appearance. but why do I object to bleached hair and calsomined faces? Because the women that do it put on an air of wickedness they don't possess. O, I know that poets sing the praises of fair-haired heroines, and angels are always dressed that way. They all write that way, but history is a better guide than poetry."

"Give me an instance."

"Mary Stuart; she came to Scotland, only nineteen years old, but with two purposes in her heart. She was young, beautiful, with blue eyes and hair like shimmering sunbeams, and a voice so low, melodious, and full of charm that it rivelled the sirens who lured Ulysses to an attempted fate. Do you suppose a brunette would have lived her life? Could the impulses that usually lead on a young and guileless girl have led to the schemes and plots which finally resulted in Mary Stuart's death? Her attempt was to dethrone Elizabeth and overthrow the Reformation. But Mary acted from impulses, you say. What were they? When she yielded to Bothwell, it was with an idea to political advantage. She could combine the baser with the loftier passions, and merge them both into one more ignoble than all.

"Elizabeth was a blonde too. Take Lady Macbeth. True she was only a vision of Shakespeare, but Shakespeare was a reader of types of humanity such as we have never known. He says that Caliban's mother, Sycorax, was a "blue-eyed hag,' and look at Macbeth's story. She drives Malcomb to call her 'fiend-like,' and the only holy passion that she has, her love for her husband, and her desire to better his fortunes, she follows out with a cool calculating persistence, which, being totally divorced from all sense of honor and uprightness, leads her only to final woe and drives him to the commission of his awful deeds.

"Thackeray pictures Rebecca Sharp a blonde, and surely you would never look for her characteristic among olive cheeks, black ringlets, and eyes where the iris melts in the shadow of darkly-shadowing fringes. Charlotte Corday's eyes were "blue when she reflected, almost black when called into play," and her hair 'seemed gold-colored at the points of the tresses, like the ear of corn—deeper and more lustrous than the wheat stalk in the sunlight.' Helen Jegado, who murdered twenty-five persons in her lifetime, was a blonde of the purest type, and there was a persistency about her cruelty, a calculating, far-seeing subtlety that has no equal outside of Milton's conception of the devil. Ninon de l'Enclos and Mme. de Chevreuse, who outwitted two cardinals, were blondes also, while Catherine de Medicis was azure eyed, with sparkling hair and face like pear and silver. They were smooth-tongued and beautiful to look upon, these women, but their plots undermined courts and camps and pulled down to destruction many brave hearts."

"But the lack of the qualities that made these women infamous would also make them weak?"

"Of course, but why should women be strong? Let the man be strong. Adam fell because of his weakness, and not because Eve tempted him. He showed his weakness afterward when he tried to lay the blame on her. Eve was weak, of course. She was a brunette and a woman. But the old Oriental legend of Lilith shows the difference in the types. Lilith, the first wife of Adam, according to this legend, was a cold, passionless, splendid women, with wondrous golden hair. She was created Adam's equal in every respect; therefore, properly enough refused to obey him. For this she was driven from the Garden of Eden, and Eve was made to order out of Adam's ribs. Then the golden-haired Lilith—jealous, enraged, pining for her lost home in Paradise—took the form of a serpent, crept into the garden and tempted Adam and Eve to their destruction. And from that day to this, Lilith, the cold, passionless beauty with golden hair, has roamed up and down the earth, snaring the sons of Adam and destroying them. You may always know her dead victims, for whenever a man has been destroyed by the hands of Lilith you will always find a single golden hair wrapped around his lifeless heart. I must go now my wife is waiting for me over there."

"What! That blonde?"

"Why, of course. Some of our ideas are only formed late in life, and then come mostly from experience."—Chicago News Interview with a Local Philosopher.

Jumping From Trains.

From the Hartford Courant.

The brakeman on the passenger trains of the Consolidated Road seldom have occasion to jump from the train while it is in motion, Most of those who jump live at way stations where express trains do not stop. Some few regular passengers are well up in the jumping act. The people who jump from the passenger trains seldom jump when the train is going at a rate of more than ten miles an hour, but a few have been known to risk the jump when the train was going twenty-five miles an hour. Most of the trainmen dislike to run the risk when the train is in motion. Even the most reckless prefer the rear platform of the last car, as there is not so much danger of being drawn under the wheels if a misstep is made. Some of the men jump off with the left foot first and the body well thrown back, so that when they strike the ground they come into an upright position almost immediately. Even then most are obliged to run some distance before they can stop. Some of the old train hands, however, can jump off and come to a standstill almost as soon as their feet touch the ground. The brakemen on the freight trains are the men who jump off the most. They jump when the train is going at the rate of from twenty to twenty-five miles an hour, always from the rear car, and always land in a perfectly upright position. The ability to jump with comparative safety when a train is going faster than ten miles an hour is attained only by long practice, as it is dangerous for a novice, who, if he did not happen to calculate just how to jump, would fall and break some of his bones.

A Pretty Wedding Present.

From a Newport correspondent: A pretty little story is told of the Earl and Countess of Roseberry, who were here a short time as guests of Mrs. August Belmont. The Countess of Roseberry is a daughter of one of the great London Rothschilds, and she is very wealthy in her own right. The Earl is amiable, manly, dignified to the last degree. A day or two before the wedding took place Miss Rothschild asked the young Earl what he would like for a wedding present from her. "Oh," he replied, "suppose you give me a box of gloves." The box of gloves was sent enclosed in an elegant inlaid case. On opening the box the Earl discovered an envelope addressed to him in a well-known hand. He expected it contained a dainty little note. It did, but not the sort of note he imagined. The contents of the envelope was a check written out and signed by Miss Rothschild, and in favor of the Earl, and was for the modest little sum of £200,000.

Miscallanus Matters.

The attendance of Roman Catholic bishops at Rome is required once within each space of three years. A law also exists obliging cardinals not to leave the Eternal city without notifying the pope. The former regulation leads to a specially large congregation of bishops at Rome at this time, and the later having been ignored by Cardinal Hohenlohe is the cause of his disgrace in the eyes of the pope.

A good illustration of the interdependence of industries, however wide their national separation, is furnished by the fact that an important branch of the iron trade is mourning over the idleness of the whisky distilleries. When only a little whisky is made there is little need of new whisky barrels, and consequently a great decline in the demand for hoop iron.

"I'm tired of hearing about our fine naval officers," said Admiral Porter the other day. "What good are our officers if they have not got anything to work with. A navy composed of officers and water don't amount to much. We might have the finest carpenters in the world, but if they did not have any tools to work with of what earthly use would they be? The government has got all this surplus revenue and they had better build a navy. We go about bragging about the American eagle. Some day some fellow 'll take us up, and we'll get 'licked.' Then we'll wish we had two navies, and everybody will be blaming everybody else because there isn't one."

A Danish steamer which arrived at New York a month ago with a fire in her hold had among her cargo 250 boxes containing 180,000 eggs. The water pumped into the vessel to quench the flames became heated and boiled the eggs hard. A speculator bought the lot for $250, intending to retail them to hotels and restaurants. He soon found, however, that the fumes of the Swedish matches, to the spontaneous combustion of which the fire was due, had impregnated the eggs with the odor of sulphur, and nobody would buy them. To add to his misfortune, the health authorities refuse to take the 180,000 eggs off his hands as offal, and he will have to transport them to a suitable place of deposit at his own expense. What puzzles him is how the sample eggs which he ate before making the purchase happened to be perfectly sweet and fresh.

It was a common saying among thristy oystermen on the north shore of Long Island Sound, in the days when stack companies had not begun to cultivate large plantations under water, that two acres of good oyster "land" were worth as much as an ordinary New England farm. There is money to be made in growing oysters, but if the business is more profitable it is also more risky than farming on dry land. The oyster's most deadly enemy is the star-fish. Near Bridgeport, Ct., about 4,000 acres of submerged land are now under cultivation, and the star-fish is rapidly destroying the crop. In three weeks the oysters on a track of 100 acres have been killed by the "five-fingers," as they are sometimes called, and an old oyster merchant has recently taken up 300,000 of the fish in seven hours by dredging. This attack upon the oysters by their enemy is not without precedent along the Connecticut shore, but it seems to be the most destructive one that has been made in many years.

Mr. Seth Green recently said to a representative of the Rochester Post Express: "My gang of men have returned from the Western lakes and I am more than gratified with their success in gathering salmon spawn. They brought with them about four millions of the finest impregnated spawn I have ever had, and they are now at the hatching house at Caledonia, where they will be hatched, and I shall be ready to send them out in due time. The party who were at work on the lakes consisted of one man on Lake Michigan, one on Lake Superior and two on Lake Huron. Jonathan Mason was on Lake Huron, Edward Beam was on both Lake Huron and Lake Michigan, and Emmett Marks was on Lake Michigan and Huron. These men go to the fishing grounds early in the spring with tugs, and when any of the fishermen find a 'ripe' female in their lakes the eggs are extracted, impregnated with the milt of the males and brought here in boxes."

Japanese Tea Houses.

Correspondence of the New Orleans Times-Democrat.

A tea house of Japan is but one story high, with a nicely matted porch, from the corners of which depend the omnipresent Japanese paper lanterns. We catch a glimpse of the interior, and are amazed at the simplicity of the appointments, although this is one of the better class of inns. The floor within is covered with the universal Japanese mats, always three feet by six in dimensions, and, therefore, used as a matter of convenience for household measurement purposes. I have also learned that the fans in use in this country, with a view to the same utility are usually made just one foot in length. These mats are scrupulously clean, and it seems entirely appropriate that we remove our shoes, in obedience to the prevalent custom, before entering. The only remaining articles of furniture are scrolls which hang on the walls, and the common sliding screens, which are used for converting the interior of a Japanese house into just as many and such shaped apartments as the owner pleases. This is a respect in which Japanese convenience goes beyond American convenience, though I am not at all in doubt as to which way I prefer.

A party of European tourists are laboriously "squatting" about some little tables, one for each guest, and sipping tea from tiny decorated cups. On the tables are also very small dishes of confectionery and sweet meats. For waiters, we observe modest, ever-smiling, clean-looking Japanese maidens, who are profuse in their demonstrations of civility. Indeed, we are tempted to call it palavering before we become accustomed to the ways of the people. The premises about the tea-house are converted into a pretty garden, with rockeries and cascades, thus giving us a sample of the landscape gardening for which the Japanese have become so favorably famous.

A Philosophic Darkey.

An old philosophic darkey was talking one day about rich men who squeezed their money and held on to it till they died, and he remarked: "Boss, dat rich man just like a fat hog in de pen. He no count till he die. When fat hog die and you scall him and clean him, den dar is spar rib and backbone and ham and midlin, and souse, and sausage meat, and lard, and chitlins, and liver, and sweetbread and ever so many good things, but while dat hog in de pen alive, he ain't worth nothin' to nobody. De rich man what don't let out his money is just like de fat hog in de pen, but he bound to die sometime—he is dat—and den all his kinsfolks cum in and harvest, and some get rib, and some get back bone and some get ham, but dey all get sumthin."

THE MILKMAID.

Across the grass I see her pass;
She comes with tripping pace—
A maid I know—and March winds blow
Her hair across her face;
With a hey, Dolly! ho, Dolly!
Dolly shall be mine,
Before the spray is white with May,
Or blooms the eglantine.

The March winds blow. I watch her go;
Her eye is brown and clear;
Her cheek is brown, and soft as down
(To those who see it near!)—
With a hey, etc.

What has she not that they have got—
The dames that walk in silk?
If she undo her 'kerchief blue,
Her neck is white as milk.
With a hey, etc.

Let those who will be proud and chill!
For me, from June to June,
My Dolly's words are sweet as curds—
Her laugh is like a tune;
With a hey, etc.

Break, break to hear, O crocus-spear!
O tall Lent-lilies, flame!
There'll be a bride at Easter-tide,
And Dolly is her name.
With a hey, Dolly! ho, Dolly!
Dolly shall be mine—
Before the spray is white with May,
Or blooms the eglantine.

A CHRISTIAN TURK.

I live on the corner of a village street, and directly opposite is the dwelling of Mr. Ferreti—a pretty white cottage with a porch in front, half hid by honeysuckle vines. The front yard is laid out in beautiful flower beds, where many plants bloom luxuriantly; and every morning and evening Mr. Ferreti may be seen watering and cultivating them with assiduous care. In the rear of the cottages are many fine fruit trees and grape vines; and beyond them a poultry yard, which seems to require considerable attention from its owner. My neighbor and I were on friendly terms, though all that I knew about him could be summarized in a few words: he was a tailor, and a Turk. A dingy signboard informed the village people of his business, and through the window I could often see him seated on his table, busily sewing. He himself informed me of his nationality, and the assertion was emphasized by the red fez that he wore constantly. He was a short man with a dark complexion, dark hair, and fiery black eyes. Mr. Ferreti was not a popular person; in fact, he had few friends, for he was of a jealous, suspicious disposition; he seemed to be always troubled with a fear that some designing person would seek to deprive him of his property. Though he was a Turk, I think he had abandoned the Mohammedan religion.

Diagonally opposite my home was an unoccupied house in a state of general dilapidation. It had been deserted for some time, but one day a strange family arrived and took up their abode there. There was an old man and an old woman, both short of stature, and with faces deeply wrinkled; they were apparently man and wife. Another old woman, tall, bony and haggard, seemed to officiate as housekeeper. The fourth and last person was a girl, who seemed about sixteen years of age. She was of small figure and remarkably quick in her movements. Her hair was decidedly red, and flew about in a way that seemed to defy subjection; her face was thin and very much freckled, and her eyes were very large, keen and dauntless. In the course of a few days I learned that the name of the family was Priggs, and that the daughter was called Lucine. The latter name seemed absurd enough at first, but I soon came to regard it as quite appropriate.

Every morning at 6 o'clock there would arise a great bustle in the stranger's house. The chimney would send forth smoke, and the tall, wild-eyed housekeeper would be seen hurrying about in the discharge of her duties. At 7 the little old man and his wife would hurry away to the depot, and take the train to the neighboring city, returning at 7 in the evening. They always carried with them a small valise, and it was a matter of great speculation to the gossips of the town what their business could be. After the old man and his wife were gone, the housekeeper would disappear and remain invisible the entire day.

The effect produced upon Mr. Ferreti by this new arrival was extraordinary. He seemed to believe that it was the development of a plot against his peace and welfare. I occasionally saw him standing in the shade of his honeysuckles, and watching, with an apprehensive air the people across the way. For some days I think his flowers suffered from lack of care. Then he consulted a carpenter, and had heavy wooden shutters put on his windows that faced toward the new neighbors, and afterward appeared somewhat reassured.

Not many days had elapsed before the girl attracted my attention. While the other members of the strange family were very shabby, she was dressed richly, but gaudily and without the least taste. I had seen a piano carried into the house when the family came, and twice a week a pale lady came to give the young barbarian a music lesson. Then would be heard desperate attempts at scales, a jangle of discords, and finally a series of crashes, followed by the teacher's departure with despondent looks. The girl, having thus disposed of an irksome duty, would come out, vault lightly upon the gate-post, and sit there, viewing with apparent interest the beautiful garden of Mr. Ferreti.

One afternoon, as I sat at my table writing, I saw my Turkish neighbor come into his garden with a hoe and watering pot, wearing his red fez as usual. In a moment I heard a peculiarly shrill voice calling:

"Hullo, red head! Hullo, red head!"

Looking out, I saw Lucine standing at the gate post, repeating at intervals her rather questionable salutation. Mr. Ferreti ignored her presence for a time, though he was evidently ill at ease. At last he said severely:

"Little girl, go away. You are rude. Go away."

Then he retired to his house with great dignity.

That night he came over to me, and began to recount his troubles.

"I haf been so mad to-day," he sighed. "Dat girl over here—she is rude—she is saucy. She sit on the post of the gate, and say to me: 'Hullo, red-hed.' Oh. I feel all hot, like fire inside. She call me red-head, but her hair is more red than mine. Ah, I vas so mad!"

"Why, Mr. Ferreti," I replied, "she is but a child, and you should not notice her. Children will be children. Perhaps she is not taught to do better, for you see her parents go away every day. Children sometimes say saucy things to me on the street, but I do not mind them. I keep cool."

"Ah! you Americans are always cool. I wish I could be so. But no; anything like dat make me burn inside. I could take the whip—the pistol—but there is the law. There should be law that children should not be rude. I say to myself, 'Can this be America, where a man cannot go in his garden without getting insulted?'"

And with that he departed in deep affliction.

The next day I saw Lucine, attired in a red silk dress, busily engaged with a coffee pot and fire-shovel in cultivating a consumptive rosebush that grew, or rather existed, in their yard. She was so interested in her new occupation that she positively refused to take her lesson when the music teacher came, and that unfortunate lady went away with an expression of joy on her pale face. The rosebush received a good deal of attention for a week, and then something new agitated the Priggs residence. One morning the old man and his wife went away as usual, but instead of the death-like silence which usually fell upon the place, there arose a clamor of voices, the shrill tones of Lucine predominating. They ceased presently, and, wondrous to relate, the chimney again set forth a cloud of smoke. About two hours afterward, I saw Lucine in earnest consultation with one of the neighbor's girls; then she entered the house, and soon reappeared, bearing an object covered with a snow-white cloth. The girl took it very carefully, and went across the street to Mr. Ferreti's gate, while Lucine retired to a window where she stood watching. They had hardly reached the gate when Ferreti came hurriedly down the walk and met her. A short parley ensued, during which he waved her away in the most emphatic manner, and she returned to Lucine. Immediately Lucine came out, banged the gate, flew across the street, and planted herself in front of Ferreti's house.

"You red-headed fool!" she cried, shaking her fist at the house; "come out here and I'll tell you what I think of you. Come out or I'll come in there."

She tried the gate, but it was fastened in some way. Then Mr. Ferreti leaned forward from his table, and opened the window.

"Ah, little cat! Ah, little cat!" he said; "go away. I would not hurt you. Go home right away."

Lucine stood on the gate. "Ain't you ashamed of yourself, you unpolite old scissors-snipper; after all the trouble I took—"

"Ah, little red cat!" cried Mr. Ferreti, with a black scowl; "your tr-r-r-rouble vas failure dis time!" He reached up quickly, and took down a long, ancient horse pistol, and took deadly aim at Lucine.

She did not move. "Who's afraid?" she said, throwing her head on one side and pouting her lips.

Mr. Ferreti lowered his pistol and shut his window with a bang, and Lucine, after reflecting a moment, slowly returned home.

That evening Ferreti came over to see me.

"Ah!" he said, with a deep sigh, "I do not feel well. To-day I haf trouble again. I haf insult. Dis morning I see one little girl come to my gate with something covered with a cloth—a white cloth. I know not vat it vas, so I go to the gate and I say:

"'Ah, little girl, what haf you there?'

"She say, 'It's a nice pie that Miss Lucine send to you, and she hope you will like it.'

"I say, 'Give to Miss Lucine my thanks, my gratitude, but take the pie back again, and say I haf no use for such things.'

"Then the girl go back, and soon Miss Lucine run over and stand on my gate, and call me 'red-head fool.' Oh, I vas so mad! I open my window and say, 'Little cat, go home.' Still she talk, so I point my pistol at her, but she vas not afraid; then I shut my window, for I did not wish to hurt her, and she go away. Why did she send the pie to me? She is not my friend. How can I know that it is all right? With my friend—with you, for instance, it is different. I would sit at your table, I would eat of your food, and place my life in your hands; but we would not do dat with a stranger; so when the girl send a pie to me, I think there vas something wrong."

I felt some surprise at this outcropping of mediæval ideas, but tried to convince him that the pie was sent out of simple motives of kindness. In spite of all I could say, however, he went away with an expression of doubt on his face; and I did not know but he thought me a partner in the plot.

Soon afterward I used frequently to see Lucine standing at Mr. Ferreti's fence watching him as he tended his flowers. He took no notice of her, and she did not speak to him. One evening she ventured to climb to the top of the post at the corner of the fence, and from that elevated seat observed his operations with greater ease. She sat with her hands folded in her lap, and with an expression of deep interest on her face. Presently Mr. Ferreti saw her and stood for a moment aghast. Then he seemed to make up his mind that the time had come for action.

"Girl, get down and go home."

"I ain't hurtin' nothin'," was the imperturbable answer.

"Go away immediately. I might hurt you. You would not like to be hurt."

"I want to see you water the flowers."

"Go home, I say!"

"I won't!"

Mr. Ferreti grasped a hoe and advanced toward her with hasty steps. She turned a little pale, but did not move. Ferreti paused within two paces of her and stood surprised and irresolute. They conversed in a low tone for a few moments, and then he retired to the house and shut the door, leaving Lucine mistress of the situation.

After that, Lucine made the fence-post her throne every evening. She always opened a conversation of which I could hear portions, like the following, Ferreti generally answering one question out of half a dozen:—

"What's that thing with the red flower? Who laid out your garden?"

"I did," answered Ferreti.

"How long did it take you to do it? Where did you learn to garden?"

"In Rome."

"Rome! O-o-o-oh!" A silence.

"Where's Rome?"

"In Italia."

"Where's 'Talyah'?"

"In Europe."

"How big is Europe?"

No answer.

"Are you a Frenchman?"

"No."

"What are you?"

No answer. And so on.

One evening Lucine mustered all her courage and boldly walked into Ferreti's garden when he was watering flowers. That roused him to a last desperate effort. He caught her by the arm and both came flying out of the gate like a whirlwind. Then she sat down on the ground as the best way of stopping her headlong career, and he sprang back inside and fastened the gate. With three leaps she cleared the fence and was in the garden again. He darted one look at her, then turned away and took up his watering pot. Having gained an entrance, she walked about examining her plants and flowers with great delight. Every evening afterward she was there, and after a time I occasionally heard him talking to her.

One night he called on me. He seemed preoccupied, and it was a long time before he broached the real object of his visit. At last he began:

"Dat girl over here make me great trouble. She is not a bad girl, but she come in my garden every night. I try to make her go away, but she come all the same. I lock my gate—she climb over the fence. She walk around and ask me questions, but I do not care for dat very much. Dat girl is smart, but she has not been much to school. But now I think dat it is not right for the girl to come there. In Europe it would be considered not proper. It would be very bad. In America it is different, but still the people will look from their windows and talk. I like not to haf the people say bad things about dat girl; but what shall I do? Shall I stay in my house? My flowers will die. They must haf water. What shall I do?"

"Mr. Ferreti," I replied, "go to Mr. Priggs and ask him to use his authority to keep his daughter at home."

"His wha'?" Use—eh?"

"Ask him to keep his girl at home."

"O—but what good? I think the girl do just what she like."

"It would do no harm to try."

"No, it would do no harm. I shall try."

The next morning I saw my afflicted friend accost Mr. Priggs as he left his gate. Ferreti with tragic gestures seemed to recount his troubles, and Mr. Priggs replied with an abject, deprecating attitude. The results of the conference were not apparent, for Lucine appeared with great regularity in the garden. One evening my friend did not appear among his flowers. His door was closed and the shutters all fastened. He had either gone away, or else beaten a retreat and entrenched himself. Lucine appeared at the usual hour, but waited in vain for Mr. Ferreti; and after walking about and calling a few times she went home. About 9 o'clock the door was opened cautiously, and Ferreti appeared, carrying a lantern and a watering pot. He came down amongst the flowers. Then a figure stole along the fence, the gate clanged, and a shrill voice said:

"Where you been? What makes you so late?"

Then I heard a series of ejaculations in an unknown language. It was evidently a wail of despair, and after that Mr. Ferreti submitted to his fate.

About a week afterward my friend came to see me again. He appeared like a changed man. His face beamed with good-nature, and he talked gayly and laughed constantly. He did not once mention Lucine nor his troubles. He brought me as a present two bottles of wine. He set them on the table, and then asked for a corkscrew and glass. When they were brought he opened both bottles, and drank a little wine from each.

"There," he said, as he replaced the glass on the table, "I haf tasted the wine. You may know it is all right."

"Confound your heathenish customs," thought I.

Mr. Ferreti having performed his duty in regard to the wine, entered into conversation, in the course of which he recounted many incidents of his travels, and informed me of many customs of European countries. In return, he desired me to enlighten him in regard to some American customs, which I did as well as I could. He departed in high spirits, and that evening I saw him pick the finest rose in his garden and give it to Lucine; at which I wondered not a little, for Ferreti was usually very miserly with his roses. On my return home one afternoon, I was surprised on entering my sitting room to find Mr. Ferreti and Lucine. They arose as I entered. Ferreti had an open paper in his hand.

"My friend," he said, as he advanced, leading Lucine, "it is with pleasure that I introduce my wife, Mme. Ferreti."

"Is it possible!" I said in astonishment.

"Ah! you are surprise," cried Ferreti, laughing, "but it is true. See, I have the deed—the bond;" and he held out the marriage certificate.

"I congratulate you both, and wish you a great deal of happiness. This is so unexpected that it did surprise me."

"It is done a little quick, but it could be no other way. Lucine like the flowers, and she please me with the questions. What could we do better? We go away and are married. But still we have a little difficulty. I say to Lucine before we are married: 'Shall we not tell your parents? Shall we not haf the wedding feast?'

"She say: 'My father cares nothing for me. My mother give me fine clothes, and she buy me a piano; but I do not care for such things. They eat little that they may save money. They say nothing to me, but go away every day, and at night count money. At home I see nobody all day but my aunt, who smokes a pipe that makes her sleep. Why should I tell my parents? Would they stop counting money to make a wedding? Would my aunt leave her sleepy pipe that she loves better than anything? No, never. It is ridicule. I am eighteen years old, and I can do as I please.'

"So we tell nobody, but go away and are married. Now we shall go and tell them, and would wish you to go with us, if you will be so kind."

So I accompanied my friends to Mr. Prigg's residence, when that mysterious gentleman and his wife returned from the city. Mr. Ferreti led the way with his wife on his arm. In the other hand he held the open marriage certificate fluttering in the breeze. I followed, feeling much amused at the whole affair.

We found Mr. Priggs and his wife in the front room, and presently the wild, haggard face of the housekeeper appeared at the kitchen door. They all stood in silent amazement at our appearance. The room was furnished with a few rude chairs and a dilapidated sofa; and in sharp contrast to these, a fine piano stood at one side. There were no books, no pictures, no ornaments of any description.

"Mr. Priggs and madam," Ferreti, gravely saluting them, "I haf the honor to announce that your daughter Lucine has become my wife, and is now Madam Ferreti. We were married to-day, as the bond will show."

There was silence for a moment. Then the old man said in a lachrymose tone, as he nursed one hand in another: "Is that so? Is that so?"

"Here is the bond," said Ferreti.

There was another silence.

"I am very poor," said the old man, in a whining tone; "I can't give her any money, any goods; nothing at all."

"I ask nothing," said Ferreti, proudly; "I haf my house, my vines, my trees, my flowers. We sall be happy. I haf the honor to say good-bye."

They turned to go, when Mrs. Priggs caught Lucine by the hands, and there was a trace of tears on her leathery face as she said, in a dazed way:—

"Little Lucine married! It can't be. It can't be. Why, she's but a child—"

"Tut, tut," whispered the old man anxiously, taking her arm; "it is done now."

Ferreti silently held aloft the marriage certificate.

"But little Lucine must have something," said the poor old woman in a broken voice, while the tears rolled down her cheeks. "We must give her—"

"O-o-o-o-o!" cried the old man, with a hypocritical expression of woe. "We are so poor. Shall we give her a broken chair? See—the tinkling piano you would hire. We cannot pay the rent. The good, kind husband will provide all things."

Lucine seemed overcome with astonishment at this unusual expression of feeling on the part of her parents; but they now relapsed into silence, and we took our departure.

The next day Mr. Priggs and his wife did not go the city. The day after, they packed their scanty furniture, and silently stole away in the early morning. No one knew where they went.

Mr. Ferreti and Lucine lived happily together. Every evening they talk and laugh in the garden as they water the flowers. I often see them taking their tea on the porch under the honeysuckles.

Not long ago I was in the city, and while I was talking to a friend on the street, two remarkable persons passed us. One was a little old man with a wrinkled face, who appeared to be blind. His faltering steps were guided by a little old woman who was very lame. From curiosity I asked my friend who they were.

"A pair of beggars who have frequented these streets for many years. Humbugs I'd dare say. They ought to be as rich as Crœsus by this time."

In spite of their disguise and affected infirmities, I recognized Mr. Priggs and his wife.—J. E. B. in Overland Monthly.

THE DOUBT RESOLVED.

To go or stay, I scarcely knew,
Perplexed by mandates twain,
For while my love pronounced "Adieu,"
Her aspect said "Remain."
'Twixt what I saw and what I heard,
My judgment wavered quite,—
Whether she meant by glance or word
To part us, or unite.

But now each lover I advise,
Like me, to make his choice;
In duty to his lady's eyes,
To disregard her voice.
Such orbs with kinder light are filled,
The nearer we adore;
And pouting lips, if bravely stilled,
Will banish us no more.

WHAT WOMEN WANT TO KNOW

Tea Gowns.

Tea gowns this season are most varied and and superb, making the question of a choice no easy one, even to those who own the weightiest of purses. Among a large number of newly-imported robes was a very beautiful one made of pale violet cashmere. In the back was a wide Watteau plait, down the center of which ran an embroidery of English violets and blush rose buds, exquisitely wrought in delicately-shaded silks. Over the shoulders was laid a coachman's cape, bordered with the floral embroidery. A second tea gown, fashioned in similar style, was made of silver-gray satin foulard, embroidered in pure white roses and buds, and lavishly trimmed with wide ruffles of oriental lace. Another very stylish gown was made of pink silk shot with silver, with a Watteau back and a Marie Antoinette fluted plastron and collar. The open sleeves were lined with pale rose-colored merveilleux, and the drapings were caught up with rose colored satin ribbons and large silver buckles. A handsome matinee was made of plain black satin lined with cardinal, and hand-painted with clusters of cardinal red geranium blossoms. For ordinary wear scores of princess robes made of cashmere, vigogne, limousine, and broche fabrics, trimmed severally with ficelle lace, satin pipings, colored Spanish lace, and bands of bias velvet, a very attractive dress for morning wear being a dark wine colored cashmere, cut into blocks around the bottom with a deep ruffle of plaited white satin set beneath. The bodice was trimmed to correspond.

Woman's Statesmanship.

Wendell Phillips, in his powerful address entitled Freedom for Women, pays this glowing tribute to the statesmanship of woman: "Deny statesmanship to woman! What! to the sisters of Elizabeth of England, Isabella of Spain, Maria Theresa of Austria; aye, let me add, of Elizabeth Heyrick, who, when the intellect of all England was at fault and wandering in the desert of a false philosophy, when Brougham and Romilly, Clarkson and Wilberforce, and all the other great and philanthropic minds of England were at fault and at a deadlock with the West India question and negro slavery, with the statesmanlike intellect of a Quaker woman, wrote out the simple yet potent charm, 'Immediate, unconditional, emancipation,' which solved the problem and gave freedom to a 'race.' How noble the conduct of those men!" continues Mr. Phillipps. "With an alacrity which does honor to their statesmanship, and proves that they recognized the inspired voice when they heard it, they sat down at the feet of that woman statesman, and seven years under her instruction did more for the settlement of the greatest social question that had ever convulsed England than had been done in a century of more or less effort before. Oh, no; you can not read history, unless you read it upside down, without admitting that woman; cramped, fettered, excluded, degraded as she has been, has yet sometimes with one ray of her instinctive genius done more to settle great questions than all the cumbrous intellect of the other sex has achieved."

Rugs and Draperies.

Among the latest imported rugs is the Khyber, with dull red ground covered with figures of strange birds, redundant scrolls and fantastic foliage in dark dull colors; the Yenada, Agra, Mayulipatam, Ahlowalla and Mrzapore grounds are of a lighter and brighter color. A Yenada has a bright blue border, and is brilliant with beautiful colors. These are used of various sizes for studios in the way of under window drapery, portieres, or the floor, as well as for dining rooms, libraries and other portieres.

Other styles of drapery are seen in heavy jute plush. One elegant design has squares of intense blue covered with Eastern figures and divided by ecru and drab, with other designs all outlined with glittering metallic threads; the other side is heavily embroidered with pineapples and foliage in gold. Another style of deep red is worked in designs of lilies, with gold and Indian foliage; the dado is a yard and a quarter deep, of dark blue covered with arabesques and quaint flowers; the border is of shaded soft brown and blue on gray ground outlined with gold. This design is duplicated in other colors. Pineapple is a favorite style, of natural size. Other portiere draperies are of richest satin or Vesuve, copper, olive and oriental colors with floriated groundwork, glinting, in some specimens, with tinsel; the wide dadoes and borders are interspersed with the spiked fronds of palm, pyramidal foliage of water lilies, ferns and great Bengal roses. Others in satin are worked into shapes of stalactites, tufted filaments and fronds.

Some mantel and table draperies of dark wine color and other warm hues of plush are worked in Bonez embroidery in floral designs in applique as large lilies, fleur de lis or other flowers, and are outlined with gold thread. There are also dadoes of the same description curtains or other drapery where tasselled catkins, the branching feathers of fern and golden rod contrast with other styles that glow with arabesques and oriental designs of palms, acanthus, the lotus, peacock's tails and fern acacia.

Harmonized Furnishing.

The keynote of a room should be harmony, and any special straining after effect is sure to be repaid by a sense of utter unfitness and incongruity. Nowhere about the house is the revival of old fashions more apparent than in the bedroom decorations of persons of luxurious taste. As the fire place is the point of decorative departure for the drawing room decoration, so the bed is the principal feature of a sleeping room. It should be, according to the latest edicts, placed upon a dais and so command the room. In addition to its own richness of carving and inlay of precious woods, it is hung and covered with the richest stuffs. Beautiful hangings lately prepared for such a bed are of pink satin, with canopy and old-fashioned valance, in addition to the eight long curtains. These are bordered by gray plush, and inside and on the satin is a vine-like ornament, made of two gold cords arranged in curves and intersected at intervals in a small diamond-shaped figure. At the points of intersection are branching leaves in gold thread. Between these are flowers on alternate sides, embroidered in colored silks with gold centers. The curtains are lined with thin yellow pink Japanese silk. Some of the new bed-spreads are very handsome. The satin sheetings in pale tints are used, decorated with open scroll patterns worked in filaselle. This is made to lie quite flat, and though done in chain-stitch has the effect of stem-stitch. On pale blue, wine-colored filaselle is used with good effect, and the border is of wine-colored plush. The French bolster colors are also of the satin sheeting, and there is one of the round rolls at the head and foot alike, the gathered heads terminating in a handsome wine-colored ornament with pendants.

Decadence of the Hired Girl.

A wealthy man from the old German country of Pennsylvania said to Gath recently: "You would not think that in our region it is hard to get domestic servants, where we have so many strong, farm-raised native girls to whom work is the chief education. Yet it is true, and I attribute it to the radical change money has effected to the real injury of the well-to-do people; for of what use is our money if we cannot get reliable cooks, nurses and maids? Not many years ago we raised the best household servants in the country and there were plenty of them at easy wages. Then we were not so puffed up with money and our girls had a pleasant relation with the family and when their work was done would come upstairs and hear what was being talked about. Now, since some of us have become rich, they are no longer invited upstairs and must sit in the kitchen, and as they are social animals they will have their company. They say, 'they don't care anything about us. We owe them nothing.' And," said my friend, "it is rapidly coming down to a sort of eight or ten hour law among servants. They will get your breakfast at a certain hour and stay with you till evening, and then they are going up in the village to have recreation. The fact is," said my acquaintance, "that they are Americans like ourselves, and if we want to draw the line on them they mean to draw it on us. There are disadvantages about dividing our republican people into two classes."

Mantles.

New winter mantles are of moderate proportions—rather long than short, however. The two shapes which prevail in mantles are the redingote and the pelisse. The former is the less dressy of the two; it is generally made of fur-lined cloth, but without any trimming. A very short cape completes the redingote, and all the outlines are edged with several rows of stitching. A variety of the same mantle is the blouse redingote, which has already been worn a great deal this autumn, and has been described. It is the full blouse, gauged upon the fronts and in the middle of the back and fastened around the waist with a belt proceeding from the side seams. The sleeves are finished at the wrists by a band and deep frilling, lined with silk. The dressy mantle is the pellisse or long and ample visite with wide sleeves, which is sometimes made of cloth or cashmere, but oftener of silk material, either plain or figured, or of velvet; the trimming is fur. Dark furs are still to be the most fashionable this winter. Real sable, left in the shade for some time past by the insane fondness for new fancy furs indulged in by our elegantes, is coming into fashion again with greater favor than ever. This beautiful fur not being, however, within reach of all purses, others of less value are also ranked high in fashion—dark Russian furs, such as black fox, otter and skunks, while sealskin, which did not become really fashionable in Paris until last year, is likely to become very much more so this winter.

Feather Fans.

There being just now a great fancy for plumage, feather fans are in high fashion. Very pretty ones are made of the gray dove's plumage, mounted in gray work, and of the blue jay's feathers mounted in Burgos mother of pearl. The peacock, and scarlet, and gold colored marabout fan are decidedly striking. A fan in ibis feathers, with mount of white ivory, is exquisite, and a fan of owl's feathers, having an owl's head with ruby eyes in the framework, is unique. Women with literary proclivities buy plain wooden fans, prepared on purpose, and get all the lions of their acquaintance to give them autographs—a slight pen and ink sketch from an artist, a verse or a madrigal from a poet—which serve to suggest small talk when this commodity is likely to fall short. Amateur as well as professional artists paint heraldic devices, monograms, crests and mottoes on parchment leaves, and have them mounted in ebony by way of contrast. Mottoes are also wrought in colored beads on the cord to which the tassel is suspended. Muslin may be used as well as parchment to paint upon, if properly prepared with a warm solution of isinglass applied on the wrong side; and being an inexpensive material does very well for beginners to try their hands.

Winter Walking Dresses.

The new winter walking costumes are mostly composed of a plain skirt, trimmed with a very deep plaited flounce around the foot, or else a skirt plaited all the way down and all around, and of a tunic draped over this skirt in horizontal plaits. The bodice is a jacket, with a basque open in front and fastened by two or three buttons only, over a plain vest buttoned down the front with very small buttons and finished into a point. Another style of walking costume, also likely to become very fashionable this winter, is as follows: Four scarfs, forming panels, compose the skirt, which is short and narrow. One of the scarfs forms the front of the skirt, two others the sides; lastly, the back one is draped into a puff under the basque of the bodice. These scarfs are cut out of some sort of printed or figured woolen material. The spaces left between them are filled up by a pleated flounce of plain cashmere, over which the scarfs seem to be laid, just as they appear to rest over a pleated flounce, which trims the foot of the skirt. A short tunic of the same plain cashmere, stretched plain in the upper part, disappears under the back panel. Five stitched seams, made with silk to match one of the prevailing colors in the scarf, go round the edge of the tunic. The jacket-bodice is made of the same material as that of the scarf; it opens in front over a vest of plain cashmere, with buttons covered with the same. This costume is very elegant, and can be made more or less dressy, according to the style and colors of the materials employed.

Household Hints.

Nice bread-cake is made of two cups of light bread dough, one and a half cups of sugar, half a cup of butter, three tablespoonfuls of sour milk, half a teaspoonful of soda, half a grated nutmeg, a teaspoonful of cinnamon, a cup of raisins chopped and with flour dusted over them. Stir all in but the raisins, and put them in the last thing. It should rise for half an hour and then be baked in a moderate oven.

A light and puffy icing for the top only of a cake is made by beating the white of one egg to a stiff froth; beat in gradually then a quarter of a pound of powdered sugar with not quite a half a teaspoonful of baking powder mixed with it. Flavor to suit the taste. This is nice for the top of almost any kind of a baked pudding, whether it is to be served in the dish in which it was baked or in saucers.

Grandmother's minute pudding, which all the family liked and I alone hated, was made in this way: Let some sweet milk come to a boil, then stir in flour which you have salted; this must be done very briskly or it will be lumpy. Stir every moment until the pudding is about like mush. Serve while hot, with sugar and cream; flavor the cream with nutmeg and vanilla.

Unless you have hired help whom you can trust implicitly, it is a good idea to use earthen dishes for milk in place of tin; they are kept clean with much less trouble. The scientists of the present day and hour claim that the germs of disease hide in the crevices of a milk-pan, and that nothing but conscientious application of absolutely boiling water will remove the danger.

A delicious dish for tea or lunch is made thus: On a very fine wire gridiron (or one made of wire net used for screens), place some slices of salt pork, cut as thin as possible, on each slice lay a good-sized oyster, or two small ones; broil, and serve hot. Coffee, crisp toast, with chopped cabbage makes an almost ideal lunch.

A plain strip of plush, with handsome fringe on each end, makes a very pretty table scarf. If to this can be added, even if on one end only, a spray of flowers in arasene embroidery, it will be an elegant scarf.

Barley water, so often recommended for the sick, may be varied and made to relish by adding stoned raisins to it. Let it boil after putting the raisins in. If figs are preferred cut them in pieces and put them in.

Sugar cookies without eggs are made of two cups of sugar, one of butter, one of milk, half a teaspoonful of bicarbonate of soda, half a teaspoonful of cinnamon or nutmeg, with flour enough to roll.

To clean carpets: Dampen some Indian meal, mix salt with it and sprinkle over the carpet; sweep vigorously. Take a small, sharp-pointed stick to remove the salt and meal from cracks and corners.

Receipt for pickling raisins: To two pounds of raisins on the stems allow one pint of vinegar and half a pound of sugar; pour over the raisins and cook very slowly for half an hour.

If the dish in which escaloped oysters and similar preparations are baked is well buttered, it will be a saving of time and money, for the oysters and crumbs will not stick to the dish.

A good way to cook potatoes for breakfast is to cut medium sized ones in quarters, drop them into hot lard, and fry till brown, the same as doughnuts.

If the stair rails are dingy, their appearance may be improved by washing them with a little sweet milk: polish with a flannel cloth.

A well beaten egg is a great addition to a dried apple pie, giving lightness and a good flavor also.

ANOTHER CENTENNIAL.

Grand Evacuation Day Celebration Next Monday in New York—Military, Firemen and Civic Societies to Join.

The celebration Monday of Evacuation day closes the long list of centennials, beginning as far back as April, 1875. The surrender of Cornwallis practically terminated the Revolution, but the British occupied New York until two months after the definitive articles of peace were signed. During the autumn following Cornwallis' surrender the peace negotiations begun, and simultaneously loyalist families began to take flight from New York, a few going to England. These departures greatly increased during the summer and autumn of 1783. One newspaper of the period speaks of 8,000 having gone within a brief time, taking all their portable property. Another speaks of 9,000 departing in one fleet. One of Carleton's staff officers, the day before the evacuation of New York, certified that 29,244 persons had left the city since the 1st of January. About half of these went to the river St. John, 9,000 to Port Roseway, N. S., others to Annapolis, Royal and so on. Departures to the mother country are not embraced in these figures, and the exodus to Nova Scotia had also begun as early as October of the preceding year. Hence, making all allowances for the great number of discharged British soldiers who were included in them, and also for thousands of negroes, it yet appears that a larger proportion of the population emigrated than stayed behind. Until the return of exiled patriots filled the gap, these depletions greatly depopulated the city.

On the 24th of November Sir Guy Carleton notified Gen. Washington that on the following day he should withdraw. The relations of these officers were dignified and creditable. When Carleton arrived, in May, 1783, to relieve Sir Henry Clinton of the command in America, the war was over. Washington had long ceased to find occasion for rejecting communications from King George's generals as not properly recognizing his status. When only a little more than a month before the evacuation of the city a gang of still effervescent and vindictive loyalists "committed an outrage upon an American vessel in the harbor of this city," as Sir Guy Carleton expressed it, "by seizing and destroying her colors in a notorious and disorderly manner," this officer took proper action. He did not direct that if anybody should again attempt to haul down the American flag his soldiers should shoot him on the spot; but he, with old Rear Admiral Robert Digby, who commanded the fleet in the harbor, signed and sealed a proclamation calling for the arrest of the offenders, so that they might be "punished with the severity due to the offense."

Washington accordingly found little real trouble in arranging with Carleton the details of the evacuation, although the correspondence was wordy. They conferred personally on the subject at Dobb's Ferry as early as May, but the difficulty of transporting the loyalists kept delaying the final evacuation. On the morning of the eventful 25th the number of foreign troops to withdraw was nearly 7,000, divided almost exactly between British and German. Washington had less than 1,000 men in camp with whom to go through the form of taking possession of the city. Noon was fixed as the time when it should pass from British to American authority. Accordingly, all the morning barges took off load after load of troops to the war ships and transports which lay in the harbor, chiefly near Governor's island. Citizens gathered at the Battery to see the red coats and Hessians go; but the scene was quiet and orderly.

There were two triumphal processions instead of one, and that Washington did not march at the head of the troops, but came later in the day at the head of the civic procession, with Gov. Clinton, who was recognized as the real authority to take possession of the city. Washington did not even concern himself with the troops, having long before practically put them in charge of Maj. Gen. Knox; and while this officer was present and in nominal command, even he had turned over the immediate management of the troops, so few were they in numbers, to Brevet Brig. Gen. Henry Jackson.

The American troops consisted of a few Massachusetts infantry and New York artillery, all that was left of the army, escorted by Capt. Stakes' troops of New York mounted militia or dragoons. The Massachusetts portion included the "light infantry" of Col. Vose, who was field officer of the day, and two companies of the Second Massachusetts under Lieut. Col. W. Hull. Both of these organizations had been among the best in the service. Col. Vose's command was made up of troops picked from the four regiments garrisoning West Point, then the military center. The artillery, under Maj. S. Bauman, were Doughty's and Moodie's companies of Lamb's Second artillery.

The troops broke camp about 8 o'clock in the morning, and marched south along the old Kingsbridge road, past Murray's, to the intersection with the Bloomingdale road, or, in other words, to what is now the corner of Broadway and Twenty-third streets. Then they turned into Bowery lane and marched as far down as Bayard's farm. On the rising ground which there ran irregularly across the greater part of the island, from Bayard's place, near Broadway, eastward along the line of Grand street till it reached Jones' hill on the east side, the British had their main line of works; for all the closely settled part of the city then laid below. As the red coats were still seen at noon lingering in the forts, the Americans halted until the British rear guard had withdrawn. Then the column moved forward again down the Bowery to formally enter the city. When Chatham street had been reached, the troops turned down Queen, now Pearl street, and then began to encounter crowds of citizens, who welcomed them with loud cheers and vigorous waving of hats and handkerchiefs. As the people caught sight, behind Stakes' horsemen, of Hull's picked light infantry, in coats of blue and breeches and waistcoats of white, marching with the precision of veterans, they broke out in well-deserved applause. When the column wheeled to the right and passed up the fashionable thoroughfare of Wall street to Broadway, the demonstrations of joy were at their height. Opposite Cape's tavern, situated at a short distance from Wall street, the troops halted to await the other procession.

The civic procession had formed on the outskirts of the city, that is to say, at Bull's Head Tavern, afterward the sight of the Bowery theater, now called the Thalia, whither Gen. Knox had repaired, accompanied by many citizens, to greet Washington and Clinton, who, with their suites, had followed the troops down from Day's tavern, situated in what is now One-hundred-and-Twenty-fifth street. The procession moved over the route already described, in this order.

First—Capt. Delavan's escort of Westchester Light Horse.

Second—Gen. Washington, and Gov. Clinton, with their suites, mounted.

Third—The lieutenant governor and members of the council for the temporary government of the city.

Fourth—Army officers, led by Knox.

Fifth—Citizens on horseback.

Sixth—Citizens on foot, led by the speaker of the assembly.

The last three bodies were eight abreast, and citizens joined on to the rear of the procession continuously. Great cheering and enthusiasm greeted it everywhere. At Cape's tavern the troops presented arms to the governor, and the drums rolled, and cannon fired a salute.

Meanwhile, one of Hull's company and one of Bauman's had already been detached to take possession of Fort George, at the Battery, near Bowling Green, to hoist the American flag there, and to fire a salute of thirteen guns. Here occurred a famous incident. The British had maliciously or jocosely unreeved the halyards, broken the cleats, and slushed the flag-staff. All attempts to climb the pole failed. But busy hands soon brought wood and tools; and a young lad who had once served as a sailor, Van Arsdale by name, nailing cleat after cleat as he made his way up the staff, soon had the halyards running again, and the flag floating. This lad was the father of old David Van Arsdale, who has been wont to hoist the battery flag every year on the 25th of November, and who died only a few days ago, over eighty years of age. The old man had counted on performing this service at the centennial celebration, but the honor will pass to his grandson.

There were ceremonies at a later day connected with the evacuation, such as Washington's farewell to his officers on December 4, and the public services of religious thanksgiving held a week later. But one event of the day itself was the dinner given by Gov. Clinton at Fraunce's to the military and civil celebrities.

In the procession Monday 2,000 red-shirted firemen will take part. From 25,000 to 40,000 soldiers will be in line. The river craft will also have a procession. Mr. Samuel Bayard Stafford of Bladensburg, Md., will be in the ranks with the flag of Paul Jones' Bon Homme Richard, the first United States flag ever made, it is said. Mr. Stafford's father rented it out so often that its frequent mendings have left but little of the original material. Gen. John Cochrane, as grand marshal, will carry the standard carried by Lafayette on his entry into this city in 1824. Capt. Ben Richardson of Harlem will drive four horses to the carriage in which Washington rode to his inauguration as president. Ex-Chiefs Decker and Harry Howard will have command of Big Six company. The Live Oak hose, 44, will precede Big Six in the line. Tammany society will have the right of line among the civic societies.

THE NEW NORTHWEST.

A Few Remarks to the Young Business Men of St. Paul and Minneapolis.

[SIXTH PAPER.]

West of the summit of the main range of the Rocky mountains, extending from 113 to 124 longitude, is the district of country which takes within its boundary a small portion of Western Montana, a large portion of Idaho, half of Oregon, and all of Washington. Like the Montana district, it is a country of large rivers and lakes, valleys, hills and mountains, with great plains, only equaled by the great levels of Dakota.

The mountain ranges, to-wit: The Rocky, Bitter Root and Cascade. The great rivers—The Missoula, Clark's Fork of Columbia, Spokane, Salmon, Snake, John Days, Deschutes, Willamette, Yakima, Pend d'Oreille and Kootenia, with their thousands of miles of tributaries, all going into the greater Columbia, and it pouring the vast flood into the Pacific ocean near the forty-sixth latitude. The Northern Pacific railroad when it strikes the Missoula river bears rapidly northwest, and makes a northing at Lake Pend d'Oreille almost to the international boundary line, thence running southwest gets to Portland at a point almost due west of St. Paul. The great Bitter Root mountain range drives it north almost to the queen's dominions and thence, crossing the great plains of the Columbia, it follows that river to tide water of the Pacific. In this district are great forests of the most valuable timber.

Vast areas of mineral wealth, valley and hillside of grazing lands, great plains of lava dust now partially occupied with some of the richest wheat fields in the world, the largest hop fields on the continent, fruits, fisheries, mountains of coal, whose black formation has just begun to be broken, and that great source of wealth appreciated. From Portland, the commercial metropolis of the Northern Pacific country on the Pacific coast, railroads are building and built north, south, east and west, ocean going steamers and ships go and come to her wharves and she sits there in the West, your direct rival and competitor for the trade of this district. Portland is older than St. Paul, has many rich old business houses, but they run in a deep, well worn rut that it will require time to get out of, and adapt themselves to the present style of business this side the mountains. In the northwest corner of the United States and of our New Northwest, is that singular formed body of water, Puget's sound. Coming far inland from the Pacific through the Strait of San Juan de Fuca, due east, you turn south into the deep waters of the sound, generally very narrow, with bold rugged shores—with a bottom affording the best anchorage in the world—here in these waters and on the shores can be made the cheapest transfers of land and sea of any in the West.

The completion of the Northern Pacific railroad opens up a new era to the people of this district and to all their various interests as it does to you. Old towns jump forward with new life and new towns and cities spring into existence.

Thus have I written of four distinct districts of country in this our new Northwest. Between the 44 and 49 paralels of latitude north and south, and from Central Wisconsin to the Pacific ocean west—Imperial Dominion—an empire in which eighty years ago Lewis and Clarke went out to discover the general direction of the great rivers, not certain that its western portion all belonged to one government; fifty years ago all Indian Territory; thirty-five years ago the first political district organized over any part of it; twenty-one years ago and the first railroad track was laid. To-day this imperial domain is overrun in every part, on land and water, on plains, valleys, hills or mountains, with as sharp, active business men as God ever created; men who are cutting down the forests, plowing up the great wheat fields, delving in the mines, rounding up the great herds, and turning the products thereof into millions upon millions of dollars of coined money, which goes to make up our aggregate wealth, and here you stand in the commercial and manufacturing metropolis which you have so far built up from the business transacted with a very small portion of this empire, which is now opening to you in its whole length and breadth. Will you prove equal to the occasion? Do you comprehend the situation? Do you appreciate the mighty power with which your rivals, East and West, will enter this domain and seek to divert the profits that you should get? Look out for your competitors from the East, and from the West. Send out your agents, go yourselves, and study up the mighty possibilities and probabilities that stand before you in this new empire. To-day you have the advantage of all concerned. It is not entirely to the men who own the goods upon the shelf and the money in the vault that the city is to owe its future prestige; goods and money are easily moved away. The men who own the city, the land on which it is builded up, who own the great blocks and warehouses, who own the dwellings in which other men, women and children must live, have much to do if they will hold here the great city of the Northwest firm to its present anchorage. Great as has been the developments of the past twenty years, so the next twenty will be far greater, and following the proportionate opportunity. Since the railroad constructor entered this domain, it has taken on a new life, and marched along with giant strides. If the construction of the few miles that we now have, have wrought such wonderful changes, what shall the near future be, and will it be for weal or woe to you? In my next and last paper we will look upon the railroad questions as they are being figured out in this imperial domain.

FAILURE.

He was unequal to the strife—
Freely he owns and feels no shame—
So from the battle-line of life
Idling along the fields he came.

A green-banked stream in summer time—
A lonely place along the shore—
A flowery mountain side to climb—
Give either, and he asks no more.

He laughs with others at the clown
That bears his name—the counterfeit—
While from the clouds his soul looks down
Impatiently, and calls to it.

A SIBERIAN CLUB HOUSE.

Russian Hospitality and Queer Ways of Showing it.

Boston Commercial-Bulletin.

Our stay at Tobolsk was short, for certain projected movements made it imperative for Gvoseikoff to press on at once to Irkutsk, to reach which place was a long, dreary and dangerous journey. But before we left we were entertained at dinner at the club house by a number of the wealthy merchants and the civil officers of the city. When we reached the club room early in the evening we found a large company assembled, the members of which in dress and in general carriage would have done no discredit to the politest society of any European capital. We were served with a dinner of the choicest viands, but the strength of the banquet evidently lay in its wines and liquors. Before we got through I came to the conclusion that the Siberian Russians can drink more champagne without getting drunk than any class of people I ever met. At this dinner they were drinking from beginning to end with scarcely an intermission, but after the substantials had been removed came their grand opportunity. Champagne flowed like water, toasts being proposed and religiously and heartily drank to everybody from the czar down to the humblest guest present. After several hours of this drinkingbout the dinner was held to be over, and in the adjoining coffee room tea and coffee were served, probably as sobering off actions.

Then the champaign was brought in again, and after partaking of more wine there occurred one of the strangest scenes that I ever witnessed. A party of a dozen gentlemen surrounded Gvosdikoff and I thought were shaking hands with him. Suddenly I saw them seize him and without a moment's warning throw him upward into the air. Almost touching the ceiling down he came, only to be tossed back and forth again and again amid the shouts and the laughter of the company. I was astounded, and concluded that the whole company were so drunk that they were crazy and were not responsible for thus insulting their guest. But a gentlemen at my side relieved my anxiety on one point, and increased it on another, by telling me that this was Sibeian-Russian custom of courteous attention, and that I would be served in the same way presently. And so I was quite out of breath, and what with the tossing and the wine, could scarcely stand straight when our friends were through with me. This sport is called "dodkeedvoate," or tossing up, and its always entered into by the better class of Siberians when they desire to show their respect for their guests in a special manner. We got away at last and drove off, thankful that we had an all night's ride before us in the cold air which might serve to revive us. Judge of our surprise, when, just outside the town we met a party of our entertainers, who, taking a short cut in their sledge through the town had thus intercepted us.

Champagne was again poured out and our mutual good health pledged in a final round, and then we drove out into the night and into the dreary wilds.

We were soon sound asleep from the effects of the champagne and the cold, biting air, so that the noise which fell upon our ears after we had gone a mile or two scarcely disturbed our drowsy senses. But our driver was wide-awake and roused us up. We listened, and in the clear night air could distinguish the jingling of bells, the trotting of horses, and the loud shouts of men. It was plain that whoever and whatever they were they were fast overtaking us. We were a little alarmed, not knowing whether we were the objects of pursuit or not, whether we might not be about to fall into the hands of some desperate fellows. We sat up in our sledge and grasped our weapons, as the pursurers could be heard just behind, fast coming down upon us, and plainly calling upon us to stop. The next moment, however, our weapons dropped nerveless from our hands as the sledges dashed up alongside us on either hand, and we heard the cheery voice of one of our entertainers saluting us, while the shouts and laughter of his companions at our evident fright rang out upon the air. Some half a dozen friends, it seems, thought that their little carousal had come to an end too abruptly, and so had piled into their sledges and followed us for another farewell.

Fighting a Snake.

Boston special: Joseph Garbwree, of Millville, had a terrible encounter with a black snake in Mendon the other day, and, after a hard struggle, managed to kill his snakeship, which measured twelve feet in length and twelve inches around its body. The snake wound around the pody of Garbwree several times, and came very near at one time taking his breath away. He is also badly bitten about the arms and legs, but was not bitten in the face. Mr. Garbwree describes the encounter as follows: He was walking, and came to the snake in the road. Garbwree began to back away from it, and the snake raised his head and started for him. He tried to jump on the snake, but the snake coiled around his legs and body in less time than he could tell it, and then squeezed him and bit him in ten or twelve different places. Mr. Garbwree got hold of a stick about two and a half feet long and struck the snake, and on receiving the first blow the snake uncoiled himself and did not try to bite him after that, but would jump all over him. Mr. Garbwree was twenty minutes in the tussle with the snake before killing it. He was taken to Woonsocket and had his wounds attended to by a physician there. Mr. Clark Cook has the snake, and it will be stuffed.

A Statue for Chief Justice Marshal.

From the Springfield Mass. Republican.

The movement to erect a statue to Chief Justice Marshall at Washington has brought to light an interesting bit of history which will result in doubling the value of the memorial of the great jurist. Congress voted $20,000 for the purpose at the last session, but before anything further could be done it came to light that the Pennsylvania Bar Association undertook to raise a fund for the same purpose as far back as 1835. The subscriptions reached $3,000, and then stopped for some unexplained reason, and the money was intrusted to a lawyer and was gradually forgotten. But the lawyer was honest as well as thrifty, and invested the moneys so judiciously that when he died his papers showed the association to be credited with a fund of twenty thousand dollars. This money, it has now been arranged, is to be used for the purchase of the statue of Marshall at Washington; while the twenty thousand dollars appropriated by congress will be devoted to the pedestal. W. W. Story has been commissioned to do the work, and the choice is a very happy one, not only because of his ability as a sculptor, but because he is the son of one of Marshall's dearest friends.

California has 1,000,000, inhabitants but only 900 churches.

Totals	200,810	7,801	92,048

From the above figures it appears that the total number of scholars in the State, enrolled and entitled to apportionment, is 200,810. Hennepin county shows the largest total—15,222—and Lake county the smallest—20. Ramsey county has 8,520. Of those not entitled to apportionment Hennepin has 550 and Ramsey 80. Lake again brings up the rear, with 4. Enrolled during the winter term in the State, 161,103; during the summer term, 139,484. The average daily attendance was 92,048. Of teachers employed there were during the winter months, 1,552 males and 2,975 females; during the summer term, 653 males and 3,537 females. Watonwan county paid the lowest average salary to male teachers—$29.52 per month—and Pine county the highest—$71.66. Hubbard county paid the lowest average salary to female teachers—$20 per month—and Aitken county the highest—$55. Hennepin county paid an average monthly salary of $50.50 to male and $34.25 to female teachers. Ramsey county paid $53.76 to males, and $36.08 to females.

Milan N. Pond, an old and respected citizen of Faribault was shot twice by a Mrs Mary M. Swartz. One shot proved to be a flesh wound in the back. The other, though not necessarily fatal, is considered very serious, being in the right side of the abdomen, and the ball has not as yet been found. In an interview with Mrs. Swartz, she says Pond has been traducing her character and had been the cause, through his vile slanders, of the separation between her husband and herself; had robbed her of her home and happiness, and when he attempted to deny it, and lay it to her husband, she became so exasperated that she drew the weapon and fired. The woman is in jail.

P. Schleiger, of Grand Meadow, Minn., lately made an assignment, with liabilities of $5,500 and assets $3,500.

Following are the names of the residents and corporations of Lake City who pay a personal property tax of more than $100 G. F. Benson, $252.67; J. C. Doughty & Co., $108.72; Samuel Edes, $145.46; S. K. Gates, $164.92; E. J. Meyroth, $131.28; George Patton, $179.13; C. F. Rogers, $141.90; Richardson Brothers, $102.34; J. W. Ray, $119.76. David Wood, $417.20; Lake City bank, $630; First National bank $749.

A double wedding took place at Worthington on the 4th. Milton P. Mann, bookkeeper of the Nobles County bank, was married to Miss Nellie A. Montgomery of Hancock, N. Y., and Marcellus Webb of Lake Crystal to Miss Jennie S. Mann. The ceremony was performed by Rev. H. H. Hart, of St. Paul, secretary of the state board of corrections and charities.

The wife and four children of Stewart of Swan River, Morrison county, died within a few hours, of diptheria, and were buried together.

A company has been formed at Slayton with $15,000 capital, to build a flouring mill.

An Interesting Patent Suit.

An interesting case, involving a very ingenious and economical device, has just been decided by the courts, the particulars of which will bear brief mention. Nelson Lyon of Albany, N. Y., has recovered judgment of $3,447.10 besides cost and interest against O. T. Fisher & Co., in the United States Circuit Court at Detroit, Mich., for an infringment of what is known to the trade as Lyon's Patent Metallic Heel Stiffener. This contrivance is one of the most useful of modern inventions, and has achieved a remarkable sale—over three-quarters of a million dollars worth, the testimony in the present suit showed having been disposed of since the patent was granted, being a grand total of 273,478 pounds, or 3,888,000 pairs. At one time the Attorney General of the United States declared the Lyon patent invalid, simply on account of an informality in the application, but this was afterward corrected by the Commissioner of Patents, in accordance with a special act of Congress authorizing such correction. Fisher's main improvement consisted in elongating the screw-hole fastening the plate, and, as defendants they based their main defence in trying to show the special act of congress was unconstitutional and that plaintiff's invention was not new. Action was commenced in May, 1880, a perpetual injunction was obtained in December following, and the case was referred to a master to ascertain the profits made by defendants and the loss sustained by Mr. Lyon. The master reported the sum as $3,384, but on motion the court doubled the same, and directed judgment to be entered against defendants for such double damages, with interest from the date of the master's report and costs.

PRESIDENTIAL POINTERS

President Arthur Favors the People with His Third Annual Message.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

To the Congress of the United States: At the threshold of your deliberations I congratulate you upon the favorable aspect of the domestic and foreign affairs of this government. Our relations with other nations continue to be on a friendly footing. With the Argentine Republic, Belgium, Brazil, Denmark, Italy, Santo Domingo and Sweden and Norway, no incident has occurred which calls for special comment. The recent opening of new lines of telegraphic communication with Central America and Brazil permitted the interchange of messages of friendship with the governments of those countries. During the year there have been perfected and proclaimed consular and commercial treaties with Servia and a consular treaty with Roumania, thus extending our intercourse with the Danubian countries, while our Eastern relations have been placed upon a wider basis by treaties with Corea and Madagascar. The new boundary survey treaties with Mexico, a trademark convention and a supplementary extradition treaty with Spain, and a convention extending the duration of the Franco-American claims commission, have also been proclaimed. Notice of the termination of the fisheries articles of the treaty of Washington was duly given Great Britain. The privileges and exemptions of the treaty will seemingly close on July 1, 1885. The fishing industry pursued by a numerous class of our citizens on Northern coasts, both of the Atlantic and Pacific oceans, are worthy of the fostering care of congress. Whenever brought into competition with like industries in other countries, our fishermen, as well as manufacturers of fishing appliances and preparers of fish products, have maintained a foremost place. I suggest that congress create a commission to consider the question of our rights in the fisheries, and the means of opening to our citizens, under just and enduring conditions, the richly stocked fishing waters and sealing grounds of British North America. A question has arisen touching the deportation to the United States from the British islands, by government or municipal aid, of persons unable there to gain a living and equally a burden on the community here. Such of these persons who come under the pauper class, as defined by the law, have been sent back, according to the provisions of our statutes. Her majesty's government has insisted that precautions have been taken before shipment was made. However, they have in so many cases proven ineffectual, and especially so in certain instances of needy immigrants reaching our territory through Canada, that a revision of our legislation upon this subject may be deemed advisable. Correspondence relative to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty has been continued, and will be laid before congress.

AMERICAN PORK.

The legislation of France against the importation of prepared swine produced from the United States, has been repealed. That result has been due no less to the friendly relation of this government than to a growing conviction in France that the restriction is not demanded by any real danger to health. Germany still prohibits the introduction of all swine products from America. I extended to the imperial government a friendly invitation to send experts to the United States to inquire whether the use of these products was dangerous to health. This invitation was declined. I have believed it of such importance, however, that the exact facts should be ascertained and promulgated that I have appointed a competent commission to make a thorough investigation of the subject. Its members have shown their public spirit by accepting their trust without pledge of compensation, but I trust that congress will see in the national and international bearings of the matter sufficient motives for providing at least for the reimbursement of such expenses as they may necessarily incur. The coronation of the czar at Moscow afforded to the government an occasion for testifying to continued friendship by sending a special envoy and a representative of the navy to attend the ceremony. While there have arisen during the year no grave questions affecting the status in the Russian empire of American citizens or other faith than that held by the national church, this government remains firm in its convictions that the rights of its citizens abroad should be in no way affected by their religious belief. It is understood that measures for the removal of the restrictions which now burden our trade with Cuba and Porto Rico are under consideration by the Spanish government. The proximity of Cuba and the peculiar method of administration which there prevails necessitate constant discussion and appeal on our part from the proceedings of the insular authorities. I regret to say that just protests of this government have not as yet produced satisfactory results. The commission appointed to decide certain claims of our citizens against the government after the recognition of satisfactory rules as to their validity was admitted to be illegal. Full reparation for the injuries sustained by our citizens should be no longer delayed and the farce of naturalization in the United States as a shield to disturbers in other countries abolished. The claims commission has finally adjourned. Some of its awards, though made more than two years ago, have not yet been paid. Specie payment is expected. Claims to a large amount which were held by the late commission without its jurisdiction have been presented to the Spanish government, as the action of the colonial law authorities has given rise to these claims. The case of the Masonic has not yet reached a settlement. The Manilla court has found that the proceedings of which this government has complained were authorized, and it is hoped that the government of Spain will not withhold the speedy reparation which its sense of justice should impel it to offer for the unusual severity and unjust action of its subordinate colonial officers in the case of this vessel. The Helvetian confederation has proposed the inauguration of a class of international treaties for the deferment to arbitration of grave questions between nations. This government has assented to the proposed inauguration of such already with Switzerland. Under the treaty of Berlin, liberty of conscience and civil rights are assured to all strangers in Bulgaria. As the United States have no distinct conventional relations with that country, and are not a party to the treaty, they should in my opinion maintain diplomatic representation also for the improvement of intercourse and the proper protection of the many American citizens who resort to that country as missionaries and teachers. I suggest that I be given authority to establish an agency and consulate at the Bulgarian capital. The United States are now participating in a revision of the tariff of the Ottoman Empire. They have assented to the application of a license tax of foreigners doing business in Turkey, but have opposed the oppressive storage tax upon petroleum entering ports of that country. The government of the khedive has proposed that the authority of the mixed judicial tribunals in Egypt be extended so as to cover citizens of the United States accused of crime, who are now tried before consular courts. This government is not indisposed to accept the change, but believes that its terms should be submitted for criticism to the commission appointed to revise the whole subject.

RELATIONS WITH MEXICO.

At no time in our national history has there been more manifest need of close and lasting relations with a neighboring State than now exists with respect to Mexico. The rapid influx of our capital and enterprise into that country shows what has already been accomplished by the vast reciprocal advantages which must attend the progress of its internal developments. The treaty of commerce and navigation of 1848 has been determined by the Mexican government, and in the absence of convention engagements the rights of our citizens in Mexico now depend upon the domestic statutes of that republic. There have been instances of harsh enforcement of the laws against our vessels and citizens in Mexico, and of denial of diplomatic resort for their protection. The initial step toward a better understading has been taken in the negotiation, by the commission authorized by congress, of a treaty which is still before the senate for approval. The provisions for the reciprocal defense of the frontier by the troops in pursuit of hostile Indians have been prolonged for another year. The operations of the forces of both governments against savages have been successful, and several of the most dangerous tribes dispersed by the skill and valor of United States and Mexican soldiers fighting in a common cause. The convention for the resurvey of the boundary from the Rio Grande to the Pacific having been ratified and exchanged, the preliminary reconnoissance therein stipulated has been effected. It now rests with congress to make provision for completing the survey and resetting the boundary monuments.

A convention was signed with Mexico on July 13, 1882, providing for the rehearing of the case of Benjamin Weil vs. The Abra Sylon Mining Company, in whose favor awards were made by the late American and Mexican claims commission. That convention still awaits the action of the senate. Meanwhile, because of the charges of fraudulent awards which have made a new commission necessary, the executive has directed the suspension of pay of the distribution quota received from Mexico.

OUR CENTRAL AMERICAN NEIGHBORS.

Our geographical proximity to Central America, and our political and commercial relations with the seat of that country, justify, in my judgment, such material increase of consular corps as will place at each capital a consul general. The contest between Bolivia, Chili and Peru have passed from the stage of strategic hostilities to that of negotiation, in which the consuls of this government have been exercised. The demands of Chili for absolute cession of territory have been maintained and accepted by the party of Gen. Iglesias to the extent of concluding a treaty of peace with the government of Chili, in general conformity with the terms of the protocol signed in May last between the Chilian commandry and Gen. Iglesias. As a result of the conclusion of this treaty Gen. Iglesias has been formally recognized by Chili as president of Peru, and his government installed at Lima, which has been evacuated by the Chilians. A call has been issued by Gen. Iglesias for a representative assembly to be elected on the 13th of January, and to meet at Lima on the 1st of March next. Meanwhile the provisional government of Gen. Iglesias has applied for recognition to the principal powers of America and Europe. When the will of the Peruvian people shall be manifested I shall not hesitate to recognize the diplomatic and representatives approved by them. Representatives of this government attended at Caracas the centennial celebration of the birth of the illustrious Bolivar. At the same time the unveiling of a statue of Washington in the Venezuelan capital testified to the veneration in which his memory is held there. Congress at its last session authorized the executive to propose to the Venezuelan government a reopening of the awards of the mixed commission of Caracas, and the departure from this country of the Venezuelan minister has delayed the opening of negotiations for reviving the commission. This government holds that, until the re-establishment of a treaty on this subject, the Venezuelan government must continue to make these payments provided for in the convention of 1866. There is ground for belief that the dispute growing out of the unpaid obligations due from Venezuela to France will be satisfactorily adjusted. The French cabinet has proposed a basis of settlement which meets my approval, but as it involves a recasting of the annual quotas of the foreign debt it has been deemed advisable to submit the proposal to the judgements of the cabinets of Berlin, Copenhagen, the Hague, London and Madrid.

THE SANDWICH ISLANDS.

At the recent coronation of his majesty King Kalakaua this government was represented diplomatically and by the formal visit of a vessel of war. The question of terminating or modifying the existing reciprocity treaty with Hawaii is now before congress. I am convinced that the charges of abuse and frauds under that treaty have been exaggerated, and I renew the suggestions of last year's message, that the treaty be modified wherever its provisions have proved onerous to legitimate trade. I am not disposed to favor the entire cessation of treaty relations which have fostered good will between the countries, and contributed toward the equality of Hawaiian among the nations.

GOOD WILL IN THE ORIENT.

In pursuance of the policy declared by this government of extending our intercourse with the Eastern nations, legations have during the past year been established in Persia, Siam and Corea. It is probable that permanent missions from those countries will ere long be maintained in the United States. A special embassy from Siam is now on its way hither. Treaty relations with Corea were perfected by the exchange at Simul on the 19th of May last of the ratification of the lately concluded convention, and envoys from the king of Zanzibar have visited this country and received a cordial welcome. Corea, as yet unacquainted with the methods of Western civilization now invites the attention of those interested in the foreign trade, as it needs the implements and products which the United States are ready to supply. We seek no monopoly of its commerce and no advantage over other nations, but as the Chinese in reaching for a higher civilization have confided in this republic, we cannot regard with indifference any encroachments on their rights.

CHINA AND THE UNITED STATES.

China, by the payment of a money indemnity, has settled certain of the long-pending claims of our citizens, and I have strong hopes that the remainder will soon be adjusted. Questions have arisen touching the rights of American and other foreign manufacturers in China, under the provisions of treaties which permit aliens to exercise their industries in that country. On this specific point our own treaty is silent. But under the operation of the most favored nations clause we have like privileges to those of other powers. While it is the duty of the government to see that our citizens have the full enjoyment of every benefit secured by treaty, I doubt the expediency of leading in a movement to constrain China to admit an interpretation by which we have only an indirect right to exact the transference to China of American capital. For the employment there of Chinese labor would in effect inaugurate a competition for the control of markets now supplied by our home industries. There is good reason to believe that the law restricting the immigration of Chinese has been violated intentionally or otherwise by the officials of China upon whom is devolved the duty of certifying that the emigrants belong to the excepted classes. Measures have been taken to ascertain the facts incident to this supposed infraction and it is believed that the government of China will co-operate with the United States in securing the faithful observance of the law. The same considerations which prompted congress at its last session to return to Japan the Simoneski indemnity seem to me to require at its hands like action in respect to the Canton indemnity fund, now amounting to $300,000. The question of the general revision of the foreign treaties of Japan has been considered in an international conference held at Tokio, but without definite result as yet. This government is disposed to concede the requests of Japan to determine its own tariff duties, provide such proper judicial tribunals as may commend themselves to the Western powers for the trial of causes to which foreigners are parties, and to assimilate the terms and declarations of its treaties to those of other civilized States. Through our ministers at London and Monrovia, this government has endeavored to aid Liberia in its differences with Great Britain, touching the boundaries of that republic. There is a prospect of the adjustment of the dispute by the adoption of the Mannah river as the line. This arrangement is a compromise of the conflicting territorial claims. The rich and populous valley of the Congo is being opened to commerce by a society called the International African association, of which the king of the Belgians is president, and a citizen of the United States chief executive officer, and large tracts of territory have been ceded to the association by native chiefs. The objects of this association are philanthropic. It does not aim at permanent political control, but seeks the neutrality of the valleys which have been opened. Steamboats placed on the river and the nuclei of states established at twenty-two stations under one flag, which offers freedom to commerce and prohibits the slave trade. The United States cannot be indifferent to this work, nor to the interests of their citizens involved in it. It may become advisable for us to co-operate with other commercial powers in promoting the rights of trade and residence in the Congo valley free from the influence or political control of any one nation.

In view of the frequency of invitations from foreign governments to participate in social and scientic congresses for the discussion of important matters of general concern, I repeat the suggestion of my last message, that provision be made for the exercise of discretionary power by the executive in appointing delegates to such conventions. Specialists are ready to serve the national interest in such capacity, without personal profit or other compensation than the defrayment of expenses actually incurred, and this a comparatively small annual appropriation would suffice to meet.

RESTRICTIONS UPON TRADE.

I have alluded in my previous message to the injurious and vexatious restrictions suffered by our trade in the Spanish West Indies. Brazil, whose natural outlet for its great national trade in coffee is in and through the United States, imposes a heavy export duty upon that product. A like narrow policy is pursued in other American countries. Our petroleum exports are hampered in Turkey and in other Eastern ports by restrictions as to storage, and by onerous taxation. The free outward movement of our great food product is in some quarters clogged with like impediments. For these mischiefs adequate relief is not always provided by reciprocity treaties like that with Hawaii or that lately negotiated with Mexico, and now awaiting the action of the senate. It is advisable to provide some measure of equitable relation with the governments which discriminate against our own. If, for example, the executive were empowered to apply to Spanish vessels from Cuba and Porto Rico the same rules of treatment and scales of prices for technical faults which are applied to our vessels and cargoes in the Antilles, a resort to that course might not be barren of good results. A discretionary authority to forbid the importation of articles of consumption injurious to health might be advantageously exercised in our dealing with countries that discriminate against our food products.

THE TREASURY.

A GRATIFYING EXHIBIT.

The report of the secretary of the treasury gives a full and interesting exhibit of the financial condition of the country. It shows that the ordinary revenues from all sources for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1883, amounted to $398,287,581.95, whereof there was received from customs, $214,706,496.93; from internal revenue, $144,720,368.95; from sale of public lands, $7,955,864.42; from tax on circulation and deposits of national banks, $9,111,008.85; from profits on coinage of bullion deposits and assays, $4,460,205.17; from other sources, $17,333,637.60. Total, $398,281,581.95. For the same period the ordinary expenditures were:

For civil expenses	$22,343,285 76
For foreign intercourse	2,419,275 24
For the Indians	7,362,590 34
For pensions	66,012,573 64
For the military establishment and arsenals	48,911,382 93
For the naval establishment, including vessels and improvem'ts at navy yards	15,283,437 17
For miscellaneous expenditures, including public buildings, lighthouses and collecting revenues	40,098,432 53
For expenditures on account of District of Columbia	3,817,028 48
For interest on the public debt	59,160,131 25
Total	$265,408,137 54
Leaving a surplus revenue of	132,879,444 41
Which, with an amount drawn from the cash balance in treasury of $1,299,312 55, making	134,178,256 96
Was applied to the redemption of bonds for the sinking fund	44,850,700 00
Of fractional currency for the sinking fund	46,556 96
Of funded loan of 1881—continued at 3½ per cent	65,380,250 00
Of loan, July and August, 1861—continued at 3½ per cent	20,595,600 00
Of funded loan of 1907	1,418,850 00
Of funded loan of 1881	719,150 00
Of loan of February, 1865	1,800 00
Of loan of July and August, 1861	216,600 00
Of the loan of March, 1863	116,850 00
Of the loan of July, 1882	4,765,000 00
Of 5-20s of 1862	103,000 00
Of 5-20s of 1864	705,000 00
Of 5-20s of 1865	960,000 00
Of 10-40s of 1865	13,355,000 00
Of consols of 1865	4,080,000 00
Of consols of 1867	23,570,000 00
Of consols of 1868	15,465,000 00
Of Oregon war debt	545,000 00
Of refunding certificates	107,150 00
Of old demand, compound interest and other notes	13,300 00
Total	$134,178,798 96

The revenue for the present fiscal year, actual and estimated, is as follows:

Source.	Est. for remaining three-quarters of y'r.	Actual for '83, quarter ending Sept. 30.
From customs	$137,597,024 33	$57,402,975 67

Total ordinary expenditures	$67,942,090 33	$190,057,909 67
Total receipts, actual and estimated	$343,000,000 00
Total expenditures, actual and estim't'd	258,000,000 00
Total estimated am't due sinking fund	45,816,741 07
Leaving balance of	39,183,258 93

If the revenues for the fiscal year which will end on June 30, 1885, be estimated upon the basis of existing laws, the secretary is of the opinion that for that year the receipts will exceed by $60,000,000 the ordinary expenditures, including the amount devoted to the sinking fund. Hitherto the surplus, as rapidly as it has accumulated, has been devoted to the reduction of the national debt. As a result, the only bonds now outstanding which are redeemable at the pleasure of the government are the 3 per cents, amounting to $305,000,000; the 4½ per cents, amounting to $250,000,000; and the $737,000,000 4 per cents are not payable until 1891 and 1907 respectively. If the surplus shall hereafter be as large as the treasury estimates now indicate, the 3 per cent bonds may all be redeemed at least four years before any of the 4½ per cents can be called in. The latter at the same rate of accumulation of surplus can be paid at maturity, and the moneys requisite for the redemption of the 4 per cents will be in the treasury long before these obligations become payable. There are cogent reasons, however, why the national indebtedness should not be thus rapidly extinguished. Chief among them is the fact that only by excessive taxation is such rapidity attainable.

REDUCING THE REVENUE.

In a communication to congress at its last session I recommended that all excise be abolished except those relating to distilled spirits, and that a substantial reduction also be made in the revenues from customs. A statute has since been enacted by which the annual tax and tariff receipts of the government have been cut down to the extent of at least fifty or sixty millions of dollars. While I have no doubt that still further reductions may be wisely made, I do not advise the adoption at this session of any measures for a large diminution of the national revenues. The results of the legislation of last session of congress have not as yet become sufficiently apparent to justify any radical revision or sweeping modifications of existing law. In the interval which must elapse before the effects of the act of March 3, 1883, can be definitely ascertained, a portion, at least, of this surplus revenues may be wisely applied to the long-neglected duty of rehabilitating our navy and providing defenses for the protection of our harbors. This is a matter to which I shall again advert. Immediately associated with the financial subjects just discussed is the important question, What legislation is needed regarding the national currency? The aggregate amount of bonds now on deposit in the treasury to support the national bank circulation is about $350,000,000; nearly $200,000,000 of this amount consists of 3 per cents, which, as already stated, are payable at the pleasure of the government, and are likely to be called in within less than four years, unless meantime the surplus revenues shall be diminished. The probable effect of such an extensive retirement of the securities which are the basis of the national bank circulation would be such a contraction of the volume of the currency as to produce grave commercial embarrassment. How can the danger be obviated? The most effectual plan, and one whose adoption at the earliest practical opportunity I shall heartily approve, has already been indicated. If the revenues of the next four years shall be kept substantially commensurate with the expenses, the volume of circulation will not be likely to suffer any material disturbance; but if, on the other hand, there shall be great delay in reducing taxation, it will become necessary either to substitute some other form of currency in place of the national bank notes, or to make important changes in the laws by which their circulation is now controlled. In my judgment the latter course is far preferable. I commend to your attention the very interesting and thoughtful suggestions on this subject which appear in the secretary's report. The objections which he urges against the acceptance of any other securities than the obligations of the government itself as a foundation for national bank circulation seem to me insuperable. For averting the threatened contraction, two courses have been suggested, either of which is probably feasible. One is the issuance of new bonds, having many years to run, bearing a low rate of interest and exchangeable upon specified terms for those now outstanding. The other course, which commends itself to my own judgment as the better, is the enactment of a law repealing the tax on circulation and permitting banks to issue notes for an amount equal to 90 per cent of the market value, instead of, as now, the face value of deposited bonds. I agree with the secretary in the belief that the adoption of this plan will afford the necessary relief.

THE TRADE DOLLAR.

The trade dollar was coined for the purposes of trade in countries where silver passed at its value, ascertained by its weight and fineness. It never had a legal tender quality. Large numbers of these coins entered, however, into the volume of our currency by common consent. Their circulation in domestic trade has now ceased, and they have become a disturbing element. They should not longer be permitted to embarrass our currency system. I recommend that provision for their reception by the treasury and mints as bullion at a small percentage above the current market prices of silver of like fineness.

CUSTOMS DISTRICTS.

The secretary of the treasury advises a combination of certain of the customs districts of the country, and suggests that the president be vested with such power in relation thereto as is now given him in respect to collectors of internal revenue by Sec. 3131 of the revised statutes. The statistics on this subject, which are contained in his report, furnish of themselves a strong argument in defense of his views. At the adjournment of congress the number of internal revenue collection districts was 126. By executive orders dated June 25, 1883, I directed that certain of these districts be consolidated. The result has been a reduction of one-third their number, which at present is but eighty-three.

WAR AND THE NAVY.

THE INDIANS MOSTLY QUIET.

From the report of the secretary of war it will be seen that in only a single instance has there been any disturbance of the quiet condition of our Indian tribes. A raid was made from Mexico into Arizona by a small party of Indians, which was pursued by Gen. Crook into the mountainous regions from which it had come. It is confidently hoped that serious outbreaks will not again occur, and that the Indian tribes which have for many years disturbed the West will hereafter remain in peaceable submission.

STATE MILITIA ENCOURAGED.

On several occasions during the past year officers of the army have, at the request of State authorities, visited these military encampments for inspection of troops. From the reports of those officers I am induced to believe that the encouragement of the State militia organization by the National government would be followed by very gratifying results and would afford it, in sudden emergencies, the aid of a large body of volunteers educated in the performance of military duties.

AN EXPOSED SEACOAST.

I again call your attention to the present condition of our extended seacoast, upon which are so many large cities whose wealth and importance to the country would, in time of war, invite attack from modern armored ships, against which our existing defensive works could give no adequate protection. Those works were built before the introduction of modern heavy rifled guns into maritime warfare; and if they are not put in an efficient condition, we may easily be subjected to humiliation by a hostile power greatly inferior to ourselves. As germane to this subject, I call your attention to the importance of perfecting our submarine torpedo defenses. The board authorized by the last congress to report on the methods for the manufacture of heavy ordnance, and adapted to modern warfare, has visited the principal iron and steel works in this country and in Europe. It is hoped that its report will be soon made, and that congress will thereupon be disposed to provide suitable facilities and plans for the manufacture of such guns as are now imperatively needed. The secretary of the navy reports that, under the authority of the acts of Aug. 5, 1882, and March 3, 1883, the work of strengthening our navy by the construction of modern vessels has been auspiciously begun. Three cruisers are in progress of construction—the Chicago, of 4,500 tons displacement, and the Boston and Atlantic, each of 2,500 tons. They are to be built of steel, with the tensile strength and ductility prescribed by law, and in combination of speed, endurance, and armament are expected to compare favorably with the best unarmed war vessels of other nations. A fourth vessel, the Dolphin, to be constructed of similar materials, is intended to serve as a fleet dispatch boat. The double-turreted monitors Puritan, Amphitrite and Terror have been launched on the Delaware river, and a contract has been made for the supply of their machinery. A similar vessel, the Monadnock, has been launched in California. The naval advisory board and the secretary recommend the completion of the monitors, the construction of four gunboats, and also of three steel vessels like the Chicago, Boston and Dolphin, as an important measure of material defense.

INTERIOR WATERWAYS.

The secretary urges the immediate creation of an interior fast line of water ways across the peninsula of Florida, along the coast from Florida to Hampton Roads, between the Chesapeake bay and Delaware river, and through Cape Cod. I feel bound to impress upon the attention of congress the necessity of continued progress in the construction of the navy. The condition of the public treasury, as I have already intimated, makes the present an auspicious time for putting this branch of the service in a state of efficiency. It is no part of our policy to create and maintain a navy able to cope with that of the other great powers of the world. We have no wish for foreign conquest, and the peace which we have so long enjoyed is in no seeming danger of interruption; yet our naval strength should be made adequate for the defense of our harbors, the protection of our commercial interests, and the maintenance of our national honor—a proposition from which no patriotic citizen can withhold his assent.

POSTOFFICE AFFAIRS.

A PROMISING STATE OF FINANCES.

The report of the postmaster general contains a gratifying exhibit of the condition and prospects of this interesting branch of the public service committed to his care. It appears that on June 30, 1883, the whole number of postoffices was 47,863, of which 632 were established during the previous fiscal year. The number of offices operating under the system of free delivery was 154. At these latter offices the postage on local matter amounted to $4,195,230.52, a sum exceeding by $1,021,894.01 the entire cost of the carriers' service in the country. The rate of postage on drop letters passing through these offices is now fixed by law at two cents per half ounce or fraction thereof. In offices where the carrier system has not been abolished the rate is only half as large. It will be remembered that in 1863, when free delivery was first established by law, the uniform single rate of postage upon local letters was one cent, and so it remained until 1872, when in those cities where carrier service was established it was increased to defray the expense of such service. It seems to me that the old rate may now with propriety be restored, and that, too, even at a risk of diminishing for a time, at least, receipts from postage upon local letters. I can see no reason why that particular class of mail matter should be held accountable for the entire cost of not only its own collection and delivery but the collection and delivery of all other classes, and I am confident, after full consideration of the subject, that the reduction of the rate would be followed by such a growing volume of business as to occasion but slight and temporary loss to the revenue of the postoffice.

POSTAL TELEGRAPH NOT DESIRED.

The postmaster general devotes much of his report to the consideration in its various aspects of the relation of the government to the telegraph. Such reflection as I have been able to give the subject since my last annual message has not led me to change the view which I then expressed, in dissenting from the recommendation of the postmaster general, that the government assume the same control over the telegraph which it has always exercised over the mails. Admitting that its authority in the premises be as ample as has ever been claimed for it, it would not, in my judgment, be a wise use of that authority to purchase or assume the control of existing telegraph lines, or to construct others with a view of entering into general competition with private enterprise. The objections which may be justly urged against either of these projects and, indeed, against any system which would require an enormous increase in the civil service, do not, however, apply to some of the plans which have lately provoked public comment and discussion. It has been claimed, for example, that congress might wisely authorize the postmaster general to contract with some private person or corporation for the transmission of messages at specified rates and under government supervision. Various such schemes, of the same general nature but widely differing in their special characteristics, have been suggested in the public prints, and the arguments by which they have been supported and opposed have doubtless attracted your attention. It is likely that the whole subject will be considered by you at the present session. In the nature of things it involves so many questions of detail that your deliberations would probably be aided slightly, if at all, by any particular suggestions which I might now submit. I avow my belief, however, that the government should be authorized by law to exercise some supervision over interstate telegraph communication, and I express the hope that for attaining that end some measure be devised which will receive your approbation.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

REGULATION OF FEES.

The attorney general criticizes in his report the provisions of the existing law fixing the fees of jurors and witnesses in the federal courts. The provisions are chiefly contained in the act of February 26, 1853, though some of them were introduced into the act from statutes which had been passed many years previous. It is manifest that such compensation as might, when these laws were enacted, have been just and reasonable, would in many instances be justly remanded at the present day as inadequate. I concur with the attorney general in the belief that the statutes should be revised by which these fees are regulated. So, too, should be the laws to regulate the compensation of district attorneys and marshals. They should be paid wholly by salary, instead of in part by fees, as is now the case. The change would prove to be a measure of economy, and would discourage the institution of needless and oppressive legal proceedings, which it is to be feared have in some instances been conducted for the mere sake of personal gain.

INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

EVILS TO BE REMEDIED.

Much interest and varied information is contained in the report of the secretary of the interior. I particularly call your attention to his presentation of certain phases of the Indian question, to his recommendations for the repeal of the pre-emption and timber culture acts and far more stringent legislation to prevent frauds under the pension laws. The statutes which prescribe the definition and punishments of crimes pertaining to pensions, could doubtless be made more effective by certain amendments and additions, which are pointed out in the secretary's report. I have previously referred to the alarming state of illiteracy in certain portions of the country, and again submit for the consideration of congress whether some federal aid should not be extended to public primary education wherever adequate provision therefor has not already been made.

UTAH.

The Utah commission has submitted to the secretary of the interior its second annual report. As a result of its labors supervising the recent election in that Territory, pursuant to the act of March 22, 1882, it appears that the persons by that act disqualified, to the number of about 12,000, were excluded from the polls. This fact, however, affords little cause for congratulation, and I fear that it is far from indicating any real and substantial progress toward the extirpation of polygamy. All of the members of the legislature are Mormons. There is grave reason to believe that they are in sympathy with the practices that this government is seeking to suppress, and that its effort in that regard will be more likely to encounter their opposition than receive their encouragement and support. Even if this view should happily be erroneous, the law under which the commissioners have been acting, should be made more effective by the incorporation of some such measures as they recommend and as were included in bill No. 2,238 on the calendar of the senate at its last session. I am convinced that polygamy is so strongly intrenched in the Territory of Utah that it is profitless to attack with the state weapons which constitutional legislation provide. I favor, therefore, the repeal of the act upon which the government depends, the assumption by the national legislature of entire political control of the Territory and the establishment of a commission with such powers and duties as shall be delegated to it by law.

THE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

is accomplishing much in the direction of the agricultural development of the country, and the report of the commissioner giving the results of his investigations and experiments, will be found interesting and valuable. At his instance a convention of those interested in the cattle industry of the country was lately held at Chicago. The prevalence of pleuro-pneumonia and other contagious diseases of animals was one of the chief topics of discussion. A committee of the convention will invite your co-operation in investigating the causes of these diseases, and providing methods for their prevention and cure. I trust that congress will not fail at its present session to put Alaska under the protection of laws. Its people have repeatedly remonstrated against our neglect to afford them the maintenance and protection expressly guaranteed by the terms of the treaty, whereby that territory was ceded to the United States. For sixteen years they have pleaded in vain for that which they should have received without asking. They have no law for the collection of the debt, the support of schools the conveyance of property, the administration of laws, or the enforcement of contracts—none indeed for the punishment of criminals except such as are afforded by certain customs, commerce and navigation acts. The resources of Alaska, especially in fur, mines and lumber, are considerable in extent and capable of large development, while its geographical situation is one of political and commercial importance. The promptings of interest, therefore, as well as considerations of honor and good faith, demand the immediate establishment of civil government in that Territory.

RAILWAYS.

Complaints have lately been numerous and urgent that certain corporations controlling in whole or part the facilities for the inter-state carriage of merchandise by the great rai of the country have resorted in their de with the public to divers measures u and oppressive in their character. In instances the State governments have att and suppressed these evils, bu others they have been unable to ford adequate relief because of jurisdictional limitations which are im upon them by the federal constitution. question whether the national governmen lawfully interfere in the premises, and if any, supervision of control it ought to e cise, is one which merits your careful oration. While we cannot fail to nize the importance of the va way systems of the country, an great and beneficial influence development of our material w should, on the other hand, remember that individual corporation ought to be inve with absolute power over the interest of other citizen or class of citizens. The righ those railway corporations to any profitabl turn upon their investment and to reason freedom in their regulations must recognized, but it seems only just that, so as its constitutional authority will permit, gress should protect people at large in t interstate traffic against an act of inju which State governments are powerless prevent.

FOREST PRESERVES.

In my last annual message I called atten to the necessity of protecting by suitable le lation the forests situated upon the public main. In many portions of the West the p suit of general agriculture is only made p ticable by resort to irrigation. While succe ful irrigation would be impossible without aid afforded by forests in contributing to regularity and constancy of the supply water. During the past year severe suffer and great loss of property have been oc sioned by profuse floods, followed by peri of unusually low water in many of the gr rivers of the country; these irregularities w in great measure, caused by the removal fr about the sources of the streams in quest of the timber by which the water supply h been nourished and protected. The preser tion of such portions of the forests on the tional domain as essentially contribute to equable flow of important water courses is the highest consequence. Important tributar of the Missouri, the Columbia and the S katchewan, rise in the mountains of Monta near the northern boundary of the Uni States, between the Blackfeet and Flathead dian reservations. This region is unsuitable settlement, but upon the rivers which flow fr it, depends in the future the agricultu development of a vast tract of country. T attention of congress is called to the necess of withdrawing from the public sale this pa of the public domain, and establishing there forest preserve.

INDUSTRIAL EXHIBITIONS.

The industrial exhibitions which have be held in the United States during the prese year attracted the attention of many forei countries, where the announcement of tho enterprises had been made public through t foreign representatives of this governmen The Southern exhibits at Louisville we largely attended by the exhibitors of forei countries, notwithstanding the absence of any professional character in those undertak ings. The centennial exposition to be hel next year at New Orleans, in commemorati of the century of the first shipment of cott from a port of the United States, bids fair meet with like gratifying success. Under t act of congress of the 10th of February, 18 declaring that exposition to be nation and international in its characte the foreign governments with which t United States maintains relations, have be invited to participate. The promoters of th important undertaking have already receiv assurances of the lively interest it has excit abroad.

The report of the commissioner the District of Columbia is herewith trans mitted. I ask for it your careful attention, es pecially for those portions which relate to as sements for taxes and water supply.

THE CIVIL SERVICE.

WORKINGS OF THE LAW.

The commissioners appointed under the ac of Jan. 16, 1883, entitled "An act to regulat and improve the civil service of the United States," entered promptly upon the discharge of their duties. A series of rules framed in accordance with the spirit of the statute was approved and promulgated by the president. In some particulars wherein they seemed defective those rules were subsequently amended. It will be perceived that they discountenanced any political or religious tests for admission to the offices of the public service to which the statute relates. The statute related in its original form to the classified clerkships in the several executive departments at Washington, numbering about 5,000, and to similar positions in the customs districts and postoffices where as many as fifty persons are employed. A classification of these positions, analogous to that existing in the Washington offices, was duly made before the law went into effect. Eleven customs districts and twenty-three postoffices were thus brought under the immediate operation of the statute. The annual report of the civil service commission, which will soon be submitted to congress, will doubtless afford the means of a more definite judgment than I am now prepared to express as to the merits of the new system. I am persuaded that its effects have thus far proved beneficial. Its practicable methods appear to be adequate for the ends proposed, and there has been no serious difficulty in carrying them into effect. Since the 16th of July last no person, so far as I am aware, has been appointed to the public service in the classified portions thereof at any of the departments or at any of the postoffices and customs districts above named, except those certified by the commission to be competent in the basis of the examination held in conformity to rules.

MISCELLANEOUS.

THE PRESIDENTIAL SUCCESSION.

At the time when the present executive entered upon his office, his death, removal, resignation or inability to discharge his duties would have left the government without a constitutional head. It is possible, of course, that a similar contingency may again arise, unless the wisdom of congre shall provide against its recurrence. The se ate, at its last session, after full considerat passed an act relating to this subject which now, I trust, commend itself to the approval both houses of congress. The clauses of constitution, upon which must depend any regulating the presidential succession, pre also for solution other questions of p mount importance. These questions relate the proper interpretation of the phrase "i bility to discharge the powers and duties of said office." Our law providing, that wh the president shall suffer from an inability, the presidential office shall dev upon the vice president who must himself, un the circumstances, give place to such off as congress may by law appoint to act president. I need not here set forth numer and interesting inquiries which are suggeste by these words of the constitution. They were fully stated in my first communication to congress, and have since been the subject of frequent deliberations in that body. It is greatly to be hoped that these momentous questions will find speedy solution, lest an emergency should arise when longer delay will be impossible, and any determination, albeit the wisest, may furnish cause for anxiety and alarm. For the reasons fully stated in my last annual message, I repeat my recommendation that congress propose an amendment to that provision of the constitution which prescribed that the formalities for the enactment of laws, whereby in respect to bills for the appropriation of public moneys, the executive may be enabled, while giving his approval to particular items, to interpose his veto as to such others as do not commend themselves to his judgment.

THE FOURTEENTH AMENDMENT

of the constitution confers the rights of citizenship upon all persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof. It was the special purpose of this amendment to insure members of the colored race the full interment of civil and political rights. Certain statutory provisions, intended to secure the enforcement of those rights, have been recently declared unconstitutional by the supreme court. Any legislation whereby congress may lawfully supplement the guaranties which the constitution affords for the equal enjoyment by all the citizens of the United States of every right, privilege and immunity of citizenship, will receive my unhesitating approval.

[Signed] CHESTER A. ARTHUR.
WASHINGTON, D. C., Dec. 3, 1883.

Manteufel, governor of Alsace—Lorraine has annulled the resolution of the district diet of Upper Alsace, allowing the use of the French language in debates. The ground of the governor's action was that the diet had exceeded its legal powers.

An imperial edict has been issued at Berlin pardoning the Roman Catholic bishop, Blum, of Lemburg, and restoring his stipends.

THE WHEAT MONOPOLY.

In Mr. Hurlbert's lame attempt to defend the course of the Pillsbury & Hurlbert Elevator Co., we may plainly see how little cause we have to expect relief from the grinding monopoly from that source. Knowing as he well must know that all the wheat his company has bought, even at its very best prices, has been bought at a margin of at least ten cents per bushel for possible decline in the market—and this, too, when wheat was at the lowest possible ebb in foreign markets, and the chances were as one hundred to one that it would go up instead of down,—besides an exhorbitant elevator charge for handling their own wheat, and the margin that the company gets on freight that a farmer (even supposing he managed to ship his wheat) could not obtain; knowing that a vast amount of splendid No. 1 Hard wheat has been taken into their elevators for from 25 to 50 cents per bushel under the pretext of its being "frozen wheat;" in fact, knowing full well, as he must know (probably better than any one of us) the TRUE INWARDNESS of the whole monopoly business if he can attempt to offer an excuse or an apology for the course pursued we can easily surmise how much mercy we can obtain in the future from the Elevator Co. or the Millers' Association; and if we ever expect relief we must provide the means for ourselves. All the letters that Mr. Hurlbert, or any other man can write, from now till the crack o' doom cannot convince that farmer who sold his wheat for forty cents per bushel, when it was worth eighty cents, that he has not been cheated out of forty cents per bushel, nor convince him that such a state of affairs is all right "after he gets used to it!" The simple fact remains with him that he has been swindled out of forty cents per bushel by a monopoly so strong as to be impossible to avoid, and what that farmer cares most to know is "how to prevent a like steal in the future?" We believe a remedy, simple and sure lies right at our doors if we will use it. How much would a railroad beginning at Grand Forks, fo instance, and running via Fisher and Crookston to Red Lake Falls cost? The most of the way it would run through a very level country that could be easily graded AND WE SINCERELY BELIEVE THAT THE AMOUNT OF WHEAT THE COUNTRY TRIBUTARY TO SUCH A LINE OF ROAD, HAS BEEN SWINDLED OUT OF THIS FALL WOULD ALMOST BUILD THE ENTIRE LINE. The city of Grand Forks, from its inception to the present time has shown itself a live, progressive, wideawake town, always alive to its own interests and never backward in contributing liberally to any cause calculated to advance its interests, and that city to-day feels the great depression caused to the business interests of this country by the Millers' Monopoly. Her newspapers are full of it and her prominent citizens fully realize the gravity of the situation and we believe would take thousands of dollars of stock in such a road. Fisher also realizes the situation and would contribute liberally. We believe we echo the sentiment of a majority of our citizens when we say that Crookston would not be a dollar behind the highest bidder and that Red Lake Falls would chalk high, her present isolated position leaves no room to doubt. Without a road what is she? With such a road her future is secure "But,' says the monopoly, "you have started your road at no place in particular and ended it in no particularly important spot; you have exhausted your money and have failed to help yourself in the least!" Is that so? Let us see about that. Suppose we can raise money enough to build and equip those few miles of road and no more, a continuation of the road to Lake Park or some point on the N. P. road is as necessary as the balance of the line and is it not reasonable to presume that the dwellers along the continuation of the line would take some stock in it? If they did not take enough what would prevent our raising enough money on our already completed line to finish it to the N. P? By commencing at this end to build we practically control the situation and could strike the N. P. road at the point that would offer the most favorable inducements. Now this is not so wild a scheme as it may appear at first glance, and all one need to do to be convinced of that fact is to imagine the number of farmers living at a distance of from 10 to 12 miles both sides of the road for its entire length from Grand Forks to Lake Park on the N. P. R. R., consider how much wheat each one has raised, and in the light of one's own experience figure out how much money has been drained out of that belt of country this year, that should have remained to help build up the country; then consider that this very monopoly will continue to drain the life-blood out of this country just as long as we remain as we are, and one can then begin to realize how far from wild the scheme is and that if he raises, or intends to raise, any considerable amount of wheat it would be better for him to invest several thousands in stock at one time than to have those thousands annually stolen from him for all time to come And such a road as we speak of would not only give the relief this country needs but would be a source of great profit to the stockholders. It would be comparatively a short line (so much the easier to build and equip) but would give us direct connection with the lake market at Duluth as well as a competing line with St. Paul and Minneapolis. Cautious men might suggest that we wait for the arrival of the Duluth & Winnipeg line. We are afraid if we wait for that, nine-tenths of the wheat-raisers,and the business men dependent on them, would be sold out by the Sheriff and need no road, if we may judge the future by the past progress of that road. No, what this country needs is relief and that by next fall at the very outside limit. This road we speak of could be ready to furnish that relief if the farmers and business men of the country are ready for the road. The road can be built if we are ready! Are we ready?

Short Weight.

A prominent farmer tells us that, having his suspicions that he was not getting full weight on his wheat at the elevator he weighed himself just before going to the elevator with a load of wheat and, then after he had got his wheat out of the hopper he got into it and weighed himself again and fell short over twenty pounds. He says he knows of one crop of 4000 bushels of wheat, machine measure, that fell short 350 bushels by weight.

History teaches us that the first settlers of our glorious country, when oppressed by grievous burdens of taxation, organized to defend their rights and liberties and fought to the bitter end against tyranny and oppression. Our fore fathers did not sit down and spend their time grumbling and growling at the situation but they ORGANIZED in defence of their rights and they won the day—won it in spite of the greatest efforts the then greatest nation on earth could put forth to prevent them and we think we can read in that fact great encouragement for our farmers and all who are in the toils of the giant monopoly—the wheat ring. We do not mean that you shall fight it by force of arms for there are other means far more effective. We know what we say when we say that this country has the means within herself to kill the hydra headed monster that is sapping its resources, that is stealing its treasure by the thousands but one man alone can not accomplish it. The newspapers, most of them, have faithfully tackled the monster and shown it up in all of its hideousness but, unsupported by organized efforts of the people directly affected by the steals even the newspapers are handicapped and work to a disadvantage. They can do and have done a great deal, and if they could now be backed up by the combined efforts of the people of this valley the monopoly could be crushed out before another crop is raised and marketed. Should the people unite, thus being enabled to act intelligently we could accomplish more in a month than we can now in a year. We would suggest a mass meeting at an early day to be held in this city for the purpose of discussing the matter and for the organization of clubs by townships. In union there is strength.

The Wheat Question.

We have given much space and devoted much time and attention to the wheat question, but not too much if we devoted every column of reading matter space in the JOURNAL from now till next fall if the result could then be an open wheat market with eastern buyers in competition with those who now control not only the markets but the destiny of the whole Northwest. Nor is our attitude (as some have misconstrued it) one if antagonism toward the railroad company and the wheat buyers ring from pure spite, but simply and solely so far as that extreme and arbitrary method of doing business is ruinous to this country. We fully recognize the importance of the railroad to our commercial prosperity but we do not stop there; we also recognize the importance of giving all due encouragement to the country, fostering and protecting its industries in the interest of the railroad company as well Without a railroad this would not be as prosperous a country as with one and without the farmers' help the railroad company's business in this country would amount to nothing, hence the dependence is mutual and both should help the other. The people of this country have generously given the railroad company the finest land grant in the world to aid in constructing its line and naturally expect and have a right to demand of the company just treatment in return. It is a simple business proposition and if the farmers enact hard and grievous laws that compel the company to do their business at a loss that is wrong and should be corrected. On the other hand if the railroad company so conduct their business as to grind the people and force them to raise wheat at a loss, in the hands of one man or one set of men forming a monopoly that is just as wrong and should be righted. Monopoly, in any business is wrong and always works against the interests of the producer. We see in this wheat business a giant monopoly controlled by the Millers' Association of Minneapolis and we have good reason to believe that that monopoly could not exist for a week if the railroad company did not protect and foster it. The manner in which the affairs of that monopoly is managed is so grasping that the entire profits of raising wheat is lost to the producer and gained by the wheat buyer and the effect of this system, unless we can change it will be certain and utter ruin to this country. No sensible man will continue to raise wheat for nothing if he could afford so to do and the result must be ruin sooner or later, and as there seems to be no inclination on the part of the parties who have the power to change this state of things the simple fact remains that we must do something for ourselves or submit and see the people of this Red River Valley ruined. Legislation can do much but not all. The best and most effective remedy we know of is suggested in the plan of a railroad to Duluth which is elsewhere suggested. This could be built owned and controlled by our own people thus forever and effectually destroying the monopoly and the chances for creating any other. The fact is that we cannot raise wheat with profit unless we can obtain for it all that the eastern market, with a reasonable freight rate deducted, will warrant and if we can not obtain those prices through the present existing channels of communication with the east we must make another or quit raising wheat.

Farmers Organizing.

Grand Forks Herald: County Commissioner Christiani came into the city from Turtle River yesterday. He reports intense indignation among the farmers on Forest River, and in Walsh County meetings have been held, and local organizations effected, for the purpose of making a battle for the rights of the farmers. It is the intention to follow the advice of the Herald, and bring actions for damages against the the railway under the common carrier's law.

Blue Grass Pastures.

While we were in attendance at the monthly meeting of the McLeod County Dairyman's Association and Farmers' Institute last week at Glencoe, some of the members of the institute expressed their satisfaction at the result of blue grass in affording such excellent pasturage for stock so late in the season. The pastures seeded to other varieties of grass was frosted to such an extent as to render them perfectly worthless for affording late food for cattle, but the blue grass was luxuriant, green, fresh and appeared to retain all of its good qualities. The stock appears to be thriving on it just as well as at any time during the fall. This proves to be a great help to the farmers in saving the fodder for winter use. But this is not all. It lengthens out the pasturing season until the beginning of winter. Another advantage the blue grass pastures have over those of others is, they come in early in the spring. They bear constant feeding early and late. Our soil appears to be perfectly adapted to its habits, and it appears to be as much at home as it is in any other part of the Union. This variety of grass is a great thing for the stock growers of this state.

Science in Agriculture.

It would be difficult to point to any very great improvement in the art of cultivation that has not owed something either in its discovery or perfection to science. Practice is impotent without principle, and theories are useless without practice—they mutually support and aid each other, yet it would be an error to suppose that any farmer must become a chemist in order to be a scientific culturist. It is the privilege of the farmers to employ for their own purposes the result of science. What chemistry has done for agriculture are but the pebbles on the sea shore of what it is destined to accomplish. But its results will be of no essential service to the farmer, unless they are brought before the public, their worth tested by actual experiment, and the conviction of their necessity forced upon every mind. In this, as in everything else, the force of example is powerful—more so than pages of carefully written and profound argument. Let a single farmer in a town commence a system of improved husbandry, and more or less will imitate him. He may be ridiculed for a while, but when it is discovered that he is making the most money, as well as excelling in other respects, he will be sure of some disciples Observe how contagious neatness is in a village; cottage succeeds to cottage, flower garden to flower garden, and lawn to lawn, and it is equally true that dilapidated houses, broken fences and weed-ridden gardens are found side by side; so on a larger scale will it be with farms. One well-tilled, productive, improving farm will extend itself beyond its boundary lines as certainly as an honest, intelligent, thoughtful man will exert an influence The great body of farmers can and should be thoroughly read and learned men, and they can and should use the details of each other's experience in their own practice, and carry out the principles which the study of scientific minds has established. In the mechanic arts science has always been the parent of improvement, and if the manufacturer would be successful he must combine all the recent discoveries in his practice—must make his capital yield the greatest possible income. Agriculture is a no less dignified and a more important art, and it requires no less ability and research than manufactures. We trust the time is at hand when short sighted ignorance will give place to more enlightened views, when the sons of the soil will invoke the aid of science as their patron divinity, and labor be invested with new power.

OFFICIAL PAPER OF THE COUNTY.
CROOKSTON, THURSDAY, DEC. 13

THE WHEAT MONOPOLY.

The time has now arrived when it is the imperative duty of the farmers and business men of the Northwest to organize in the defense of their rights if they dare to assert them and hope to maintain them. By a vigorous kick against the monopoly and by constantly keeping its evil effects before the people the newspapers of the Red River Valley have succeeded in opening the eyes of the business men of St. Paul and Minneapolis to a realizing sense of the injustice of the giant monopoly not only to ourselves but also to them and they are now prepared to help us to crush out the monopoly. More than that the Monopoly itself finds that it has "bit off a bigger chunk than it can masticate" from the fact that every available source for storage in Minneapolis is occupied, and carloads of wheat are standing on the tracks, the elevators along the line are all full to overflowing and yet the wheat is not all taken in. Moreover, the Monopoly has used its last dollar in the purchase of the wheat it has and finds itself lacking the money necessary to handle the whole crop. This causes a blockade and that with the vigorous protest from the whole Northwest, together with the fact that the millers also monopolize all of the banking capital of the two cities to enable them to retain their grip on the wheat business, causes business men to begin to look into the matter and to begin to clamor for an open wheat market. This wheat business is getting entirely too large to be controlled by one man or one set of men acting as one but the M. A. has too big a bonanza to release their hold until they are obliged to but public sentiment is getting strongly against this giant monopoly and it has got to go if the wheat-raisers, and the business men of the Northwest will but combine to give it a parting kick. Everything else has now been done that can be and now it is time for the farmers to come to the front. That the enemy are weakening and upon the point of fleeing was never so apparent as the past week has shown and it only needs the combind efforts of farmers to make it a complete rout, and to provide an open wheat market for next fall. The Pioneer Press of Dec. 8th says:

"The question of an open market has been revived by the present condition of affairs, and the relations of the Millers' Association toward such a market is being discussed. The question naturally arises whether it is wise to further struggle against what seems to be an over whelming fact, and cause other legitimate interests to suffer by locking up an enormous sums of money necessary to carry out the peculiar theories of the millers. It is a question whether the time, if not already come, is not fast approaching, when the present complications will resolve themselves into a free market and an open board. The peculiar conditions of the present season, seen in the reduced water supply and unusually free and early marketing, seem to point strongly toward such a result."

The above extract indicates daylight ahead. It shows that business men are beginning to wake up to their own interests and that, if they can be shown the full extent to which they have really suffered already they would demand an open market at once. If they could but see and feel as we do up here the enormity of the steal which, by depriving their patrons of the full value of their wheat renders them unable to meet their payments promptly, thus forcing them to wait for their pay or to resort to expensive litigation for it with a sure prospect of losing a portion at that. The business men of St. Paul and Minneapolis are cutting their throats at both ends of the route. Down there they are paying large interest for money accommodations, and submitting to be pinched for money, in order to enable the Millers to use that money up here to purchase our wheat at from one-third to two-thirds its real market value, which steal prevents farmers being able to pay their store debts, thus rendering our merchants unable to meet their own obligations in St. Paul and Minneapolis. Now is the time for the farmers to organize so that their side of the story may be heard. They should collect the necessary affidavits to prove all the newspapers have said, then the newspapers will be able to lay that proof before the people in a tangible shape that can not be disputed and thus will be able to show those business men wherein they too suffer with us from this monopoly. Never before has the necessity for organization been more apparent and we would suggest the plan of calling a mass meeting of the farmers of Kittson, Norman, Marshall and Polk Counties to meet at the court house in Crookston at some time in the near future to discuss this matter and to take steps toward an organization by towns or by counties as it then seems best. We now almost have the game in our own hands and it only needs that we seize and use our opportunity. What say you, farmers, shall we do it?

The Farmers vs. Monopoly.

Fargo Republican.

This age in this country presents the majority of the people chasing after riches. Money, money, is the cry on every hand and with it, and by it, nearly all things are controlled. Men sell their souls for it; women sell their soul and bodies for it; it encourages dishonesty and puts a premium on meanness; men associate themselves together in order to render their combined capital more powerful fo the accomplishment of profit, than their individual wealth could achieve alone, thus we get corporations without souls, except the sole purpose of making money. Everybody knows and feels the power of money, and a large majority of the people are willing to do most anything to secure it. How often do we hear that quaint expression, the admonition of a dying Quaker to his son: "Thee must get money, son; thee must get it honestly if thee can; but thee must get it." Honesty, deceney, and all that are supposed to be the attributes of an ideal man or woman, must be sacrificed, if necessary, to secure that which constitutes the wealth of earth. Aside from the actual committal of crime on the part of private individuals, the meanest acts for the sake of money are committed by great and powerful corporations—meaner because their power is greater, and the personal responsibility more completely hidden from the world. Corporations are instituted with large capitals and from the collection of individuals entering into its organization the best intellects are selected to direct the immediate movement and carry out the policy of the corporate body. They are made human machines to carry the train of interest on to its golden destination and, like the great locomotive that speeds over rails of steel, crushes out many lives under its grinding wheels. In this organized form they secure the power to impose upon entire communities, many individual members of which would take advantage of their neighbor in a horse trade even though that neighbor had in times past contributed to the wealth of him who would turn betrayer upon the first opportunity, if he was to profit thereby. Corporations are mean only so far as power extends (and the same is true with many individuals) but they secure power first by organization and then wield it to that extent permitted by the ignorance and unorganized condition of the society in which they do business.

The howl that we hear on all sides about elevator companies and railroads comes from the representatives of a people who possess within themselves the means with which to redress all wrongs of monopolistic nature, and why do thy not do it? Simply because man has not yet reached that high plain of perfection where each will consider the interests of his friends and neighbors equal with his own, in other words there are too many men who are ever ready to sell themselves and throw several friends into the bargain without their knowledge or consent. This struggle between money and principle will be a one sided affair in favor of the former—by a large majority—until the people—each integral factor of a community, can come out from the dense shade of their own vine and tree and look around them. The snail that retreats within his own shell may be hurried upon a current of adversity to destruction and not be aware of his own danger until too late; a sleeping army can be plundered by an insignificant but cunning enemy—it is the same with communities. The retiring man who "takes no interest in politics," is like the soldier who sleeps upon his arms and permits the depredations of the thief. If the farmers, as a class, are wronged, why is it? It is simply because they "take no interest in politics." Politics belong to the people and if they are careless how they protect their own property the thieves will step in and take it. They do not appreciate the value of politics until they are compelled to pay tribute to dishonest legislation, and then is when the complaints come in. Every citizen is a soldier in the army of a community's body politic and owes a duty to the public; if a majority in the community neglect this duty they will sooner or later be called upon to pay the penalty. "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty" and liberty is too great a boon to be purchased for less than it is worth.

COUNTY CURIOSITIES.

We a week or two since asked Mr. M. R. Brown a question It was never answered. We will ask some more. If they are disagreeable it is Mr. Brown's fault, not ours; and fear of incurring his or any other man's displeasure will not stop us from preventing the misappropriation of county funds. At the last meeting of the county beard Capt Brown obtained an order for $400 as a commission on placing the county bonds of $40,000. Now, it was distinctly stated that the bonds were to be placed at par, and to bear interest at six per cent. per annum, and therefore this commission was illegally paid; moreover, if a commission was to be paid at all, the chairman had no right to it, for his office precludes him from legally accepting any pecuniary interest therefrom. Now, was it really a commission, or was it not, in fact, an honorarium? Was it not paid to Mr. Brown as a reward to his services in placing the bonds? If so, and we know we are right in our surmise, by what power or authority do the commissioners reward one of their own comrades? Gentlemen, it is time these little fraudulent practices were put a stop to, and we call on the county attorney to obtain on injunction to prevent this money being paid over.—[Fisher Bulletin.

If we understand Mr. Brown as well as we think we do he cannot and does not fear the strictest scrutiny of all of his acts, either in public or in private business. An honest official should never fear the light of day, and as Mr. Brown is just that kind of an official, we are sure that he does not. The charge that he has misappropriated the funds of the county is too ridiculous to need refutation among Mr. Brown's friends, who know him to be incapable of such a breach of trust, but such reckless statements might possibly mislead a stranger to the facts. Capt. Brown did obtain an order for $400, which is one per cent. on the $40,000 of county bonds which he spent a great deal of time and was at considerable expense in placing. After having faithfully accomplished a task that places $40,000 worth of bonds at 6 per cent., a lower rate than any county in the State has succeeded in obtaining, Mr. Brown did not even bring in a bill against the county for his services, as he had as much right to do as would any other business man who had performed the same work for the county, but the Board, recognizing the services done, passed a resolution giving him a just fee. If the Board had sent the bonds to some broker outside of our own city and county the broker who succeeded in placing them at seven or eight per cent. would have done a good thing, and his fees would have been considered very reasonable if not more than one per cent. We venture to say that no broker could have placed these bonds at less than seven per cent. and that by placing them at six, Mr. Brown has saved this county $400 annually for 29 years. For that reason he is deserving of commendation rather than censure, and is more clearly entitled to just and reasonable fees than would be the broker who would have placed the bonds at seven or eight per cent. and then been paid his fees without a murmur. Now, as to "that little transaction of $3,100 discounted thirty days before the order was given or due," that is a plain misrepresentation of facts if we understand the case referred to, which we suppose to refer to Mr. White's bill. First and foremost Mr. Brown did not advance the money on that order and the party who did would hardly have been foolish enough to incur the risk before the order had been allowed by the Board, if he had, the county could in no wise be made to suffer. We suppose the transaction was similar to hundreds that have been done before, of which the Bulletin is fully cognizant and never protested against, that is, parties who have had bills against the county have frequently discounted these orders in order to obtain money before the time that they could draw their orders. The Bulletin seems very ready to find fault but does not seem half so ready to commend a faithful action. If it did, it could not fail to notice and commend the faithful labors of the Board to secure a just and equitable taxation. We venture to say, that as faithfully as former Boards have worked, none have done better than has the present Board in this respect as well as in very many others. The position of county commissioner is in no wise a very desirable one, on the contrary quite the reverse, and it requires great ability to successfully perform its labors. We presume the Bulletin really has the benefit of the people of the county at heart (we believe that it admits that itself) and if so, why does it not give the "rascally Board" the benefit of some of its wisdom beforehand, not wait until the horse is stolen and then grumble about it.

The Best Way Out.

Hon. Geo H. Walsh, of Grand Forks, was in the city Wednesday, talking railroad strong. He says it is build a road to Duluth or suffer the country to be busted by the millers' monopoly.—[POLK COUNTY JOURNAL.

There is but little doubt but what Mr. Walsh echoes the sentiments of all who have considered the results of the giant monopoly of the Northwest, the Millers' Association of Minneapolis. There is no doubt but the best way out of the dilemma is to secure competition both in railroutes and in elevator companies. The fact that nine-tenths of the wheat marketed on the line of the Manitoba road is bought for the Millers' Association is enough to convince all that competition is all that will allow the farmers the proper grade for their wheat. It will be readily observed that the Millers' Association has the power to keep the grade down and then buy wheat at their own price. The price, of course, is regulated to a great extent by the Chicago and Milwaukee markets, but if the Millers, Association can buy No. 1 Hard at a grade of No. 1 they are enabled to secure their wheat at a price that will enable them to make from ten to fifteen cents per bushel. Whether that is made by the elevator men or by the association is not positively known. Mr. Hulbert in his card said that it was dishonest agents that were to blame for the wrongs, that they bought wheat for the Millesr' Association which established the grade, and they were bound to abide by the decision of the association. It would seem that in many instances dishonest buyers were to blame, according to the statements of the local press, but for the most part the blame rests with that organization, which by securing control of the elevators of the Northwest, is in a place to dictate terms to the people or the great wheat growing belt of North Dakota and Minnesota. The remedy seems to be competition, and a road to Duluth seems the most feasible. Duluth has it in her power to secure the wheat of the Northwest and by aiding and securing a road to some portion of the Northwest, that city will rival Minneapolis as a wheat market. A road to Duluth seems to be the best plan to throw off the yoke that the Millers' Association has put upon the farmers of the Northwest.—Grand Forks Plaindealer.

Grading Wheat.

Under the head of "The Millers of Minneapolis the Salvation of the Farmers," Mr. C. A. Pillsbury, of the Minneapolis Millers' Association, in the Minneapolis Tribune of date Dec. 15th discusses the situation at length and tries to show that the Association is the salvation of the farmers of this country and yet he fails to show why wheat which was actually No. 1 Hard was stolen from the farmers for from 25 to 60 cents per bushel when worth, at the regular market rates at least 82. Mr. P. again fails to make his point to the satisfaction of farmers who have been fleeced by the Association for they had no other resourse no FREE market and they have been taught that salvation is FREE! Salvation is free but the farmers of the Northwest, who are forced to depend on the M. A. for a wheat market have everything but a free market. The M. A. claims to be the salvation of the farmer by dispensing with the middle man and dealing directly with the farmer thus being enabled to pay the farmer more per bushel for his wheat than he would get in a general market controlled by middle men. If this is the fact why is it that the Millers' Association prices are at least twenty cents per bushel less than the eastern markets, after a reasonable allowance for freights? Upon what theory do the elevator companies reconcile their exhorbitent charge of 2½ cents per bushel for handling their own wheat in their own elevators with their pretense of being the "salvation of the farmers!" Their system is an arbitrary one from which there is no appeal and as such allows them to fix the price of wheat as low as they choose and the farmers must take what they offer or let it alone. They make loud professions of their zeal in the cause of the farmer, they say they "want him to get the largest prices possible for his wheat so that he may be happy and the country prosperous!" The farmer objects to all of this lavish expense on his behalf and asks to be releived of the great burden of gratitude under which he is forced to be placed by having an open wheat market, and how do these charitable (?) institutions meet this demand? Why, they say, "to remedy this we contemplate making large additions to our storage room another season!" In this day and age of the world men are not very liable to work for nothing nor are they very apt to work from motives of love to their fellow-men—they work for the almighty dollar solely, and this is seen in this case very clearly in the fact that the elevator companies do not contemplate letting up on their grip in the least. If they were working for the "salvation" of farmers they would not object to the farmers trying the effects of an open market as they desire to do. We had an open market one fall, the fall that Mr. E C. Davis, bought wheat in this city, Mr. Davis made a practical illustration of the millers' professed "salvation" business by offering up in the neighborhood of what the wheat was worth and what was the result? The farmers received good prices for their wheat but Mr. Davis was kicked out of the wheat buying business too quick. It seems this "salvation" business sounds very pretty and reads right smoothly but it don't pan out worth a cent for the millers, when put to as practical a test as Mr. Davis applied. Mr. Pillsbury suggests appointing a committee whose business it shall be to examine the workings of the P & H. elevator system to ascertain if it is not all right and doing a heavy "salvation" business. So far so good but that is not what the farmers need and demand. They need demand an open market wherein they are obliged to take their chances with the buyers and they will be satisfied with no other arrangment. What right have the millers' association to force themselves upon this country and to force the farmers to sell their wheat to them and no other? What right have they to dictate where we shall sell our wheat and force us to submit to their will and pleasure? They have no right save the right of having the power to do so and we can see no better way of escape than to build a road to Duluth. The elevator men claim that their elevators are public and any one who has the money can buy wheat and ship wherever he likes. Well, supposing he can what will that profit him after he has paid all of their charges and shipped his wheat to the eastern market by an all rail route? To get our wheat to the eastern markets and leave us a fair profit it should go to Duluth by a more direct route than it can now be shipped and thence by water. We never can do this, of course, until we have a railroad direct to Duluth. The way has been suggested and has met with such a hearty approval that we confidently expect some move set on foot at an early day to secure the accomplishment of the object. The long and short of the whole matter is that there is too much money in wheat for the millers' to let loose their grip on it until forced to do so and a railroad to Duluth will force them quicker and more effectually then the Legislature or any other man.

"A Literary Republic."

"Fifty millions of people, mostly fools," was Carlyle's pointed way of putting it. The now brilliantly successful Literary Revolution—which a few months ago was supposed to be permanently doomed—assumes the opposite, that people are not mostly fools, but that they want Good Books rather than trash, and the "Literary Republic" is the result. Every reader is a voter. Ballots in the first election are to be cast (by postal card) before January 1, 1884. The following are the first "candidates" for honors:

GEORGE RAWLINS.—"History of the Seven Great Monarchies of the Ancient Eastern World." In three large 12mo. volumes, about 2,400 pages, with profuse and fine illustrations. Price reduced from $18 to $3.

JOHN RUSKIN.—"Modern Painters," and "Stones of Venice." In five handsome 12mo. volumes, about 3,250 pages, with many illustrations. Price reduced from $39 to $4.

GUIZOT AND DeWITT.—"History of France from the earliest times to 1848." Translated from the French. Profusely illustrated. In five large 12mo. volumes, about 4,000 pages. Price reduced from $25 to $5.

HENRI VAN LAUN.—"Complete History of French Literature." In two large 12mo. volumes, about 1,00 pages. Price reduced from $7.50 to $1.50.

The candidates stand separately. Vote for those you want, one or all. It will take 10,000 votes for each to elect. The 10,000 being received, the books described will be published during the present winter on the terms stated. No money is asked in advance. You can receive and examine the books before paying for them. A specimen number of the Irving Library, giving samples of type, paper, and other particulars, will be sent free to any applicant. Address JOHN B ALDEN, Publisher, 18 Vesey Street, New York.

December "Choice Literature."

This magazine, without any rival in its economy of cost continues to occupy its place in the front rank of literary periodicals. Among its December contents we note: "On being Pilled," a spicy anonymous sketch, presumably by James Payne; "The 'Why' and 'How' of Land Nationalization," by A. R. Wallace, one of the ablest English champions of the theory that the land rightly belongs to the whole people, and not to individuals; "Wallenstein and the Drama," a very able critical article, dealing particularly with the writings of Schiller, who is ranked by many as the greatest literary genius of Germany, and his subject, one of the most remarkable characters in the great Thirty Years' War; "The Lake George Tour," by J. Arbuthnot Wilson, a very readable sketch; "Inequality in punishment," by Lord Justice Fry, one of the most difficult problems with which statesmen and jurists have to deal discussed with great ability; "The Towers of Silence,"—a funeral custom of India; "Wordsworth and the Duddon," a charming sketch of a great poet and the scenes of which he wrote; "Canadian Home Rule," by Lord Lorne, late Governor-General; "The Future Prospects of Madagascar," by Rev. Geo. A. Shaw the missionary whose name was so prominent in the recent complication between France and England; "Honeysuckle," a nature study, by Grant Allen, a poet-naturalist; "Senilia," Prose Poems, by Ivan Turgeneiff; "Robert Browning," an enthusiastic and scholarly paper, by Hon. Ryden Noel; "The New Birth of Christian Philosophy," an able theological study, by Rev. r Bary; and "Sleeplessness," a most practical and interesting paper by an anonymous writer. Does any even of the $4 magazines ever present a more brilliant and instructive array of high-class literature? $1 a year, single numbers 10 cents. John B. Alden, Publisher, New York.

Larimore Pioneer: Dissatisfaction with the wheat market continues without change. The people along the line north of Grand Forks are worse off than we, not being able to get cars while every elevator is full. Along this line no such trouble has been found. People of every neighborhood are dissatisfied. Some from near here haul their wheat to Arvilla, while the people there are fully as much annoyed and some of them bring their wheat here. A move is on foot and in splendid hands to build a farmer's elevator here next season, with a capacity of 50,000 to 70,000 bushels, the stock being owned by a number of farmers, so as to prevent its being sold out to the millers' association. This, with the splendid flouring mill, will make matters more satisfactory another year.

MORTGAGE SALE.

DEFAULT HAS BEEN MADE IN THE condition of a certain mortgage, duly executed and delivered by Benjamin J. LaDuke and Mary E. LaDuke, his wife, mortgagors, to M. R. Brown, mortgagee, dated the 29th day of September, A. D. 1882, and recorded as a mortgage in the office of the Register of Deeds of the County of Polk and State of Minnesota, on the 2d day of October, A. D. 1882, at 1:30 o'clock p. m., in book "H" of mortgages, on page 299, on which there is claimed to be due at the date of this notice the amount of two hundred twenty-three 83-100 dollars ($223.83) and no action or proceeding has been instituted at law or in equity to recover the debt, secured by said mortgage, or any part thereof.

The said mortgage was duly assigned by an instrument thereof, duly executed and delivered by the said M. R. Brown to Joseph Kelso, dated the 23d day of February, A. D. 1883, and recorded in said office of the Register of Deeds on the 27th day of February, A. D. 1883, at 4 o'clock p. m., in book "K" of mortgage records, on page 563.

Notice is hereby given that by virtue of a power of sale contained in said mortgage and of the statute in such case made and provided, the said mortgage will be foreclosed by a sale of the mortgaged premises therein described, which sale will be made at the front door of the Court House, in the city of Crookston, in the County of Polk and State of Minnesota, by the Sheriff of said county, on the 25th day of January, A. D. 1884, at 10 o'clock a. m. to satisfy the amount which shall then be due on said mortgage, with the interest thereon and taxes, if any, on said premises, and costs and expenses of sale, and twenty-five dollars attorney's fees as stipulated in said mortgage in case of foreclosure.

The premises described in said mortgage and so to be sold is the lot, piece or parcel of land situated in the County of Polk and State of Minnesota, and known and described as follows, to-wit: Beginning at a point fifty feet (50ft) east from the southwest corner of lot one in block forty-four (44) in townsite of Crookston, according to the recorded plat thereof now on file in the office of the Register of Deeds, thence at right angles northerly one hundred and fifty feet (150 feet) thence at right angles easterly and parallel with Sixth street fifty feet (50ft) thence at right angles southerly to the line of Sixth street one hundred and fifty feet (150ft) thence westerly along the line of Sixth street fifty feet (50ft) to the place of beginning, being 50 feet front on Sixth street by one hundred and fifty feet deep.

Holiday goods in endless profusion at Herb's.

Dont forget the Farmer's Daughter to-morrow evening at Ericsson's Hall.

The "German Farmer" will appear at Ericsson's Hall on Friday Evening Dec., 28th.

Go and sample Herb's stock of Holliday toys and candies. None like 'em elsewhere.

The Catholics are holding a Fair this week in the hall over Fortier's sample room. The attendance is large and the receipts bed fair to be also.

Rev. H. L. House will preach at the Baptist church every Sabbath at 11 a. m, until further notice. In a few weeks there will be services morning and evening. [34-tf]

Have you seen Herb's magnificent display for the holidays. Just call round and examine his goods the best and sweetest ever imported into the "frosted wheat" regions.

A raffle for a fine piano and a sewing machine will come off at Ole Bang's place on the evening of Dec. 29th. Here is an opportunity for all for all who desire to try their luck at a small cost.

Geo. Merritt, traveling for Joyslin & Merriam, Minneapolis, is in the city in the interest of his firm. He is now on this route, we believe, but he is one of the kind who will make friends any where.

Mr. Joyslin, of the firm of Joyslin & Merriam, Minneapolis, is interviewing our city for the first time in three years. He says that our city has made rapid strides within that period and predicts a brilliant future.

"Nevada, or the last Mine" sometime during holiday week by our own Dramatic Association. The play is one adapted to give full scope to the talent of each member of our excellent company and will be well worth hearing.

Mr. Geo. H. McCrea, of Warren, paid us a pleasant call on Wednesday. He says the farmers are all in arms on the wheat question and ready to do anything in their power to dodge the "salvation" doses the millers' association offers.

Herb keeps the best of everything in his line.

Kretzschmar's new mill at Red Lake Falls met with a slight check in its career last week. A portion of the race washed out which will delay them a day or so. The break was similar to the one that occurred at our city water works a short time since.

A yard man, named Dave Withey got his foot caught in the turn table on Tuesday night and very severely bruised. It was wedged in so tight that it took some 15 minutes to extricate him. When he was taken out Dr. Dampier examined the foot and found no bones broken.

Capt. Whitcomb, the little granger of Clay Co., and the "masheen" man of Alexandria, was in the city on Wednesday on business and pleasure intent. We attempted to talk up wheat matters with the granger side of him but he was in a hurry to go and get the fur cap that Tom Sprague left for him on his last trip and could talk of nothing but the "masheen" business.

Try Herb for holiday goods, at the P. O. News stand or the branch, corner of Robert and Main Sts.

The electric lights shone forth for the first time on Tuesday evening. The lamp at E. M. Walsh's hardware store was lighted and a test made working perfectly satisfactorily. As it always takes time in these matters the system will not be in complete working order until everything is perfectly adjusted a matter of a day or two. There are 25 lights already engaged and more to follow.

During the past week we have conversed with many upon the proposed line from Grand Forks to some point on the N. P. and the sentiment is almost universally in favor of the line being built. The farmers all agree that they are heartily sick of the present state of affairs and want a change and at no time in the history of this country could the road be built easier than now. The time to strike is when the iron is hot and the country is now red hot over the impositions it is forced to bear.

Herb Mason is a public benefactor. He don't intend that the little ones shall miss their merry christmas if the millers do steal all of the wheat at starvation prices. So that good Santa Claus has just filled up both stores chuck full of goodies for the stockings of the dear little ones—enough to fill every little stocking in the city chuck full and running over—and all for a very small compensation. Herb has raised wheat enough to be "personally pinched" and knows just how to sympathize with the rest of us. Take your pennies to Herb and see what he can do for the little folks.

Tom Bjoin has received a car-load of wagons and bob-sleds from the celebrated Stoughton manufactory.

That auctioneer at the New York Store is a circus in himself. It is worth price of admission just to listen at him.

Herb's goods are all No. 1 Hard, 62 lbs. to the basket; and he is selling them all at frosted wheat prices.

Charlie Seely will dish up the boss lunch on Christmas day. Baked pig, chickens, ducks and turkey galore. Tom and Jerry will officiate and greet their many friends.

A letter recently received by Louis Anloff from Tom Jeffers reports that worthy living in clover, near Fort Benton, in Montana. Tom says he has taken a sheep ranch on shares and the way he takes on over that country would lead one to infer that he was as near to paradise as one can get on this mundane sphere. He says that wheat is worth $1.50 per bushel, oats 75 cents, butter 50 to 60 per lb. and other provisions in proportion. We sincerely hope Tom will do well in his new home.

Herb Mason does some blowing about his holiday goods this week but everybody agrees, when they come to see them that the half had not been told. Go and see for myself. That proves it.

Our reporter dropped in and enjoyed a nice supper at the Catholic fair now in session over Alderman Fortier's place, on Wednesday. The ladies of that church have spared no pains nor expense to get up a nice meal and have succeeded admirably. The attractions are many and we might say too numerous to mention among which are noted the voting of different articles to different persons. On Wednesday evening the chief attraction in this particular was the voting of an elegant dressing case to the handsomest and most popular young lady resulting in the victory of Miss La Due over her contestant, Miss O'Brien, by a close vote of 608 to 619. The dressing case was presented by P. H. Kelly & Co., and is a handsome one. Then came the vote on the fine little dolly, the contestants being the Misses Fontaine and Stuart the former winning the prize by a vote of 446 to 468. To-night the chief attraction will be the voting on the gold headed cane, the contestants being His Honor, Mayor Stuart and E. M. Walsh Esq. The victor will not have a walk away as the contest is sure to be hot and close. The fair seems to be a success in every particular.

The millers' association seem surprised to find that farmers are not happy yet, after they have made the "amende honorable" for stealing all of the profits of wheat raising by writing letters calculated to explain (!) that they are not to blame. Owning and controlling the business absolutely, fixing arbitrary grades from which there is no appeal, regulating the price of wheat by their own ability to take care of and handle it thus securing the whole business at a price that leaves absolutely no profit to the wheat raiser they seem to feel surprised that the few words of explanation (that don't explain) that they condescend to offer ought to compensate the farmers for the loss of all the profits of their labors and they are greatly surprised that their promise to build more elevators next year to enable them to more absolutely control the wheat don't satisfy the farmers at all Let them build their elevators if they want to the only sure relief for this country is to be found in a railroad to Duluth. That is the only sure remedy

If letters similar to the following were sent to our Representatives by prominent business men in the Northwest it would increase the chances of the passage of the Nelson Pine Land Bill very materially.

Hon. D. M. Sabin, U. S. S. Washington, D. C.

SIR: During the last two years I have been in communication with a great many people with reference to the opening up of the Red Lake Indian Reservation, and during the last session of Congress I had a correspondence with Senator Windom and the Hon. W. D. Washburn on the subject, with a view to bringing about the required legislation at that time, but unfortunately the matter could not be reached during that session. Since that time I have been constantly receiving letters from settlers all over this land district with reference to opening up and disposing of the pine, which is greatly needed on these western frontiers, and from parties in this and other states who desire to settle upon government agricultural lands, all praying to devise some scheme whereby the desired result could be brought about. Deferring to the wishes thus expressed, I have drafted and distributed petitions this fall at different points through this land district, and so far have received and transmitted to the Hon. K. Nelson, member of Congress for this district, petitions in favor of opening these lands, containing at least 7000 names. Within the last few days I have observed that Mr. Nelson has introduced a bill for the opening up of the said reservation and on examination its provisions seem to accord with the view of all who have given the matter any thought; there is only one trivial change that, upon mature deliberation a few of those who have examined the bill think ought to be adopted, and that is to provide for surveying the reservation in the usual way instead of subdividing it into forty acre tracts. This would cut down the cost of the survey very materially and would not in any way change the result to be arrived at. I have tried to procure information as to the topography of the country, and with that end in view have interviewed several reliable parties who have prospected through the reservation in various directions and have arrived at this conclusion: On the west side, commencing a short distance west of Red Lake the country as a whole is good agricultural lands, and on the southeast and north sides of the lake there is a large amount of good pine suitable for the wants of the community tributary thereto for a good many years to come. The time has now arrived in the history of Minnesota when nearly all of the available farming lands within its borders has been taken up and occupied by a thrifty class of settlers, and yet thousands are still looking for homes within its borders. (For an example 13 townships at one time suspended for Indian purposes were opened for settlement on July 18th, 1883, and at this writing not to exceed 25,000 acres of these townships remain unsettled.)

On this and other Indian reservations are large tracts of the best agricultural lands within the State, neither occupied nor improved by the handful of Indians who roam through the country and urgently needed for the wants of the white settlers and the development of the State. These settlers who have occupied the large prairies in the west part of this State and the eastern part of Dakota adjacent thereto, are greatly in need of the lumber that this reservation can supply and which supply is yearly being diminished and destroyed by fire running through the pine forests.

On behalf of the thousands vitally interested in and believing it for the best interests of the State, I would solicit your hearty support of Mr. Nelson's bill.

Very Respectfully,

P. C. SLETTEN, Receiver.

THE SUN.

NEW YORK, 1884.

About sixty million copies of THE SUN have gone out of our establishment during the past twelve months.

If you were to paste end to end all the columns of all THE SUNS printed and sold last year you would get a continuous strip of interesting information, common sense, wisdom, sound doctrine and sane wit long enough to reach from Printing House Square to the top of Mount Copernicus in the moon, then back to Printing House square, and then three-quarters of the way back to the moon again.

But The Sun is written for the inhabitants of the earth; this same strip of intelligence would girdle the globe twenty-seven or twenty-eight times.

If every buyer of a copy of The Sun during the past year has spent only one hour over it, and if his wife or his grandfather has spent another hour, this newspaper in 1883 has afforded the human race thirteen thousand years of steady reading, night and day.

It is only by little calculations like these that you can form any idea of the most popular of American newspapers, or of its influence on the opinions and actions of American men and women.

The Sun is, and will continue to be, a newspaper which tells the truth without fear of consequences, which gets at the facts no matter how much the process costs, which presents the news of all the world without waste of words and in the most readable shape, which is working with all its heart for the cause of honest government, and which therefore believes that the Republican party must go, and must go in this coming year of our Lord, 1884.

If you know The Sun, you like it already, and you will read it with accustomed diligence and profit during what is sure to be the most interesting year in its history. If you do not yet know The Sun, it is high time to get into the sunshine.

RING OUT, WILD BELLS.

ALFRED TENNYSON.

Ring out, wild bells, to the wild sky,
The flying cloud, the frosty light;
The year is dying in the night;
Ring out, wild bells, and let him die.

Ring out the old, ring in the new,
Ring, happy bells, across the snow;
The year is going, let him go;
Ring out the false, ring in the true.

Ring out the grief that saps the mind,
For those that here we see no more!
Ring out the feud of rich and poor,
Ring in redress to all mankind.

Ring out a slowly dying cause,
And ancient forms of party strife;
Ring in the noble modes of life,
With sweeter manners, purer laws.

Ring out the want, the care, the sin,
The faithless coldness of the times;
Ring out, ring out my mournful rhymes,
But ring the fuller minstrel in.

Ring out false pride in place and blood,
The civic slander and the spite;
Ring in the love of truth and right,
Ring in the common love of good.

Ring out old shapes of foul disease;
Ring out the narrowing lust of gold;
Ring out the thousand wars of old,
Ring in the thousand years of peace.

Ring in the valiant man and free,
The larger heart the kindlier hand,
Ring out the darkness of the land,
Ring in the Christ that is to be.

A Story of a Christmas-tree.

At the very tiptop of a long hill stands a big white house; and at the foot of the hill stands a little house which the winds and rain and sun have painted black.

Mrs. Deane, who lives in the big white house, has one little girl and Mrs. Day, who lives in the little black house, has three.

Every Monday morning the three little Days tug a big basket up the long hill to the white house, after the weekly "wash;" and every Thursday afternoon they tug it up again, filled with clothes as sweet and clean as sweet and clean can be. For Nora and Nannie and Bess have no papa, and their mamma has to work early and late to earn clothes for their growing bodies, and bread enough to fill their hungry little mouths. Sometimes there isn't enough.

Now I have come to the story.

It was the week before Christmas, and little May Deane, in the pretty sitting-room of the house on the hill, was chatting to her mamma and Dicky, the canary, about Santa Claus, and what she was sure he would bring her when there came a knock at the door.

It was Thursday afternoon, and Nora and Nannie and Bess had brought home the clothes.

Mrs. Dean asked them in to wait for the basket; and when they were in Dicky sang for them, and May kept up her chatter, tipping her head sideways, and looking almost like a canary herself, with her yellow curls and bright eyes.

"What do you suppose Santa Claus will bring you?" asked she.

The little Days stared very hard at each other and at May. Nora answered; she is the oldest,—

"We don't know who he is."

It was Mary's turn to stare. In all her life she had never before saw anybody who didn't know Santa Claus.

"Then who gives you things Christmas?" asked she.

"We don't have any," answered Nora, "thout's sometimes we get our winter shoes then."

"Why, don't you hang up your stockings?"

"No," said Fora.

"Nor have any Christmas-tree, ever?" May asked.

"No," said Nora again; and then Mrs. Deane came back with the baskets, and the three little Days made three little curtsies and went away.

May stood at the window and watched them go down the snowy road. Her face was very sober.

"Mamma," she asked, "why don't Santa Claus ever go to their house?"

"Perhaps the chimney's too small for him," answered mamma, with a smile.

"It isn't a chimney at all; it's a stove pipe," said May. "Maybe it is too small."

She looked out of the window for a long time, without speaking. At last she said,—

"Don't you s'pose he'd go there this year if I wrote him a letter and asked him to?"

"Perhaps," mamma answered, "if he had gifts enough in his pack."

"If he hadn't, mamma, he needn't come here."

Mamma smiled. "Then I think he might," she said. "But the stove pipe—how could he manage that?"

May thought a moment. Then she clapped her hands and whirled about like a live top, spinning right up to her mother's side at last.

"O mamma, mamma!" she cried, "let me be their Santa Claus and make em' a tree like the one Aunt Bella made for me last year, and I looked in the parlor and caught her tying on the oranges! O mamma, can't I please?—with strings of pop-corn and candy horns and apples? And then I won't care if Santa Claus, the really-truly Santa Claus, mamma, doesn't come here. Can't I, please?"

And mamma kissed her little daughter's lips. "I think you can," said she. "You may ask papa about it."

"I just the same's know he'll say I can!" cried May. And so he did, pinching her round cheeks red, and teasing her a good deal about getting sooty going down Mrs. Day's stove-pipe.

What fun it was! May went about the house with dancing eyes. You see she had a secret, and I'd like to know if there ever lived a little girl who didn't enjoy a secret—such a beautiful secret, too! It was just the best sport to peep into the parcels which papa brought home from the village. Then there was the corn to pop and string, and the apples to get ready; and of course this work would take a great deal of time if you wanted it to (so to bring Christmas quicker), and string a good deal of corn and tied a good many apples, just as May did.

So Christmas came, or the day before Christmas, which is almost as much fun; and May's papa went to the wood-lot and brought home the tree, a trim little fir, with dark green, glossy boughs. He planted it straight and firm in a tiny tub, filled with sand, which May stuck full of twigs and bits of evergreen.

"So nice for Nannie to wash her doll's clothes in," said she. "It's just big enough." She meant the tub.

Then she hung the apples and candy horns on the branches, and the strings of pop-corn, like little snow-wreaths and the gifts. There was a warm shawl for Mrs. Day, a dress for each of the three little girls, a doll with real hair for Nannie, a tea-set for Bess and a pretty work-box for Nora.

That night, when the stars began to come out, May's papa took her on the big hand-sled, with the tree, and away they flew down the long hill to the little black house. Papa set the tree on the step. Then he knocked gently, and whisked May away from the door.

What do you suppose Nora and Nannie and Bess said and did when they peeped out saw the tree.

"They just hollered and hollered, and hopped up and down!" cried May to mamma, when papa had drawn her home again. "And then they all took it in and shut the door. O mamma, I'm so glad I did!"

And after all Santa Claus paid the big white house a visit; of course he did. For it wasn't really he who made the Days' Christmas-tree you know—it was only little May Deane.

DEATH OF O'DONNELL.

The Slayer of Carey was Hanged in Newgate Prison at 8 O'clock Monday Morning, 17th Inst.

LONDON, Dec. 17.—O'Donnell, the slayer of Carey, was hanged in Newgate prison at two minutes past 8 o'clock. Despite the boisterous and squally weather considerable crowds were at the prison at 7 o'clock this morning. Hundreds of workmen passing by the jail watched to gaze at the black flag. Among them were O'Donnell's brother who paced opposite the flag-staff in the most restless and dejected manner, exciting the sympathy of all present. The hangman's arrangements were perfected, and the execution occurred without a hitch. O'Donnell was calm and collected, and made no statement on the scaffold.

O'Donnell was notified at 7:30 to make ready. He was perfectly resigned, and expressed great sorrow for the outburst of temper in the dock at the conclusion of his trial. He said he had felt the greatest animosity for the witnesses who appeared against him but it had now disappeared. After communion had been administered to the condemned man, Binns, the hangman, entered the cell. O'Donnell submitted to the operation of pinioning with a smile, and without a murmur. The procession then moved toward the scaffold. O'Donnell walked with great firmness, without the assistance of the wardens, who stood close around him, and was perfectly calm and self-possessed. While standing on the drop he looked around unconcernedly. Binns performed the remainder of his duty quickly. He allowed a drop of eight feet, six inches, the noose placed exactly as Marwood used to place it. Binns pulled the lever of the trap precisely as the neighboring church clocks were striking eight.

THE CROWD IN FRONT OF NEWGATE increased rapidly, and shortly before 8 o'clock numbered 2,000 persons. The streets were closely packed, but the throng observed a quiet and orderly demeanor. The Irish element was not conspicuous. As the moment for the execution approached the crowd swayed up against the prison wall and the roadway, which was before kept clear, was blocked. The police, however, moved rapidly through the multitude and easily cleared the way. When the black flag was hoisted, announcing that the hanging was at an end, there was no demonstration, although suppressed excitement marked many faces. O'Donnell's brother remained to the last, bitterly weeping, the center of a sympathizing group. The clouds began to break as the hour of 8 approached, and when the black flag was run up it was distinctly displayed against the rising sun. The people immediately dispersed after the hoisting of the flag.

Big Fire in St. Paul.

Tuesday, at midnight, an alarm called the entire department to quench a fire in the five-story pressed brick block of E. F. Drake, Numbers 178 and 180 East Third street, St. Paul. The fire caught in the lower basement, and either in the engine room or in the wine room of George W. Magee's place which occupies nearly the whole of the ground floor. At 1:30 Magee's restaurant, which, with the bar at the lower corner, occupies nearly all of the first floor, was seen to be in flames. It was the handsomest restaurant west of New York, its fittings costing $30,000.

Mrs. Magee, who was on watch at midnight, had just finished counting the cash and put it in the safe when she smelled the smoke and immediately sent a waiter to give the alarm. She then warned the ten girls and as many men servants, who sleep in the basement, and they readily escaped, some of them taking a few of their effects, though in the hurry but little salvage was secured. There were some fifty tenants in the building, which was completely gutted.

Magee's fittings cost him fully $30,000, and his insurance amounted to but $13,000.

E. F. Drake says his insurance is between $50,000 and $60,000, but how much he cannot tell, neither can he tell his loss.

At 2:50 o'clock the burning roof of the Drake building fell in, forcing the flames through into the Hardenbergh building adjoining. The fire made rapid headway, in spite of the efforts of the firemen, and inside of fifteen minutes the flames reached the upper floors and burst through the windows, breaking the glass as if struck by a heavy instrument.

P. R. L. Hardenbergh & Co., leather and findings, lose $115,000, fully covered by insurance in various companies.

Arthur, Warren & Abbott, notions and furnishing goods occupying the second floor of the Hardenbergh building, lost their entire stock, estimated in value at $50,000. They are also fully covered by insurance and will lose nothing. Less on Hardenbergh building $40,000. The total losses will amount to $350,000.

How to Use It.

There are two ways of using a medicine—the wrong way and the right way. A medicine, if misapplied, or if only partially tried, or if used too frequently or too seldom, cannot accomplish what it would when dealt with properly. Everybody knows this. Dr. Thomas' Eclectric Oil is a very valuable preparation, and will do all that is claimed for it if directions are followed.

For Catarrh.

Pour a little of the Oil into a spoon and snuff gently through the nose two or three minutes at a time, and several times a day. The mucous membrane of the nasal organs may be a little sensitive by reason of the disease, and the practice we here recommend may be a little disagreeable at first; yet, if pursued patiently, it will cure catarrh, leaving no ill effects whatever.

For a Cold or Cough.

Swallow a half teaspoonful of Oil, also gargle in the throat, and if the cold is severe, or settled in the lungs, apply externally, in frequent and liberal doses about the throat and chest. The absorbing qualities of this medicine are wonderful, and the patient will be astonished to find how quickly his cold leaves him—its disappearance first evincing itself in the absence of the close, choking sensation about the bronchial tubes and the speedy loosening and expulsion of phlegm and other deleterious matter. Dr. Thomas' Eclectric Oil will cure a cold nine times out of ten. For diphtheria, asthma, and bronchitis it is equally good. Dr. Thomas' Eclectric Oil is guaranteed—every bottle. Remember this. By Druggists everywhere. Foster, Milburn & Co. Mfrs., Buffalo, N. Y.

The reason why so many die with consumption, is because they neglect to use the proper remedy in season. When the system is first attacked with a cough, oppression of the chest, or seated pains in the breast, Allen's Lung Balsam will cause the phlegm to raise, heal the irritated parts, and restore the system to health.

REPUBLICAN NATIONAL COMMITTEE.

Senator Sabin Elected Chairman of the Republican National Committee, Which Decides Upon Chicago, June 3, as the Place and Date of the National Convention.

The Republican National Committee met at Washington on Wednesday. All the states and territories were represented.

First in the order of proceedings was the election of chairman to succeed the late Gov. Jewell, and this subject was disposed of shortly after the committee was called together. It was shown that he was the only man whom it seemed possible to hit upon as absolutely free from old factional agreements, and the only committee who could be elected to the place without a contest, which it was desired to avoid. This having been settled, the programme was carried out by placing Chaffee in the chair temporarily, and then electing Sabin permanent chairman, he being named by Mr. Elkins. This was done unanimously, and Sabin presided over the deliberations of the day, and will continue to manage the business of the committee and convention. On taking the chair, Mr. Sabin said:

While deeply sensible to the distinguished courtesy you have conferred, I am doubtless, as much surprised as the country at large will be at the announcement of your choice, but being pressed by all parties in the interest and claim of peace and harmony I accept what is rather a distasteful position this time. I trust, however, the work of this committee will be characterized by the same unanimity with which I have been elected and at the next election a republican president by a like unanimous vote of the whole country. [Applause.]

Gen. John C. New offered a resolution, which was adopted, providing that a committee of five should be appointed by the chairman to have complete charge of the convention, of which committee the president and secretary should be members.

It was also decided to have the district conventions within ninety days of the convention the date of which was fixed as June 3.

The place for holding the convention excited a good deal of interest. Gentlemen were heard in favor of Philadelphia, Indianapolis, New York, Chatuqua, etc, but Chicago won on the first ballot as follows:

Chicago	26	Saratoga	1
Cincinnatti	18	Philadelphia	1

Chicago was declared the place of the next Republican convention.

THE CALL.

The following was adopted:

A Republican national convention will meet in Chicago, Ill., Tuesday, June 3, 1884, at 10 o'clock noon, for the nomination of candidates to be supported for president and vice president at the next election. Republican electors of the several states, and all other voters without regard to past political differences, who are in favor of elevating and dignifying American labor; extending and promoting home industry, giving free popular education to the masses of people, securing free suffrage and honest counting of ballots, effectually protecting all human rights in every section of the common country, and who desire to promote friendly feeling and permanent harmony throughout the land by securing a national government pledge to these objects and principles, are cordially invited to send for each state four delegates at large, for each congressional district two delegates, and for each representative at large two delegates.

The call is signed by all the members of the convention. Mr. Chandler offered the following, which was unanimously adopted:

Resolved, that this committee views with regret and indignation the recent attempts to suppress human rights, destroy free suffrage and honest counting of ballots in various States, by methods foreign to humanity and civilization. Against the prevalence of such methods the Republican party stands irrevocably pledged, and we extend our sympathy to all sufferers from such inhumanities, and pledge our earnest unconditional support and right hand of fellowship to all men, all organizations; whatever may be in past political action, who now unreservedly commit themselves to an organized effort to secure free education, free suffrage and protection of life and property of all citizens, without regard to race, color, political opinion or vote.

The committee at 11 o'clock adjourned to meet at the Grand Pacific hotel, Chicago, the 31st of May, 1884.

Mr. Frye of Maine then submitted his proposition for the new basis of representation in the next convention which was discussed at great length by various members. Logan argued that the resolution proposed was not such as the committee had power to act upon. He was willing to defer it to the next national committee, for that was a body that had the right to consider it. Clayton opposed the plan, and Magee moved that the whole matter be referred to the next national convention. Magee's motion was finally agreed to—yeas 25, nays 18.

The plan was finally referred to the convention by a decisive vote, so that the ratio of delegates and the size of the next convention remains as it was. Senator Logan proposed a resolution, making it mandatory upon the districts to hold their conventions separately and within the several districts. By the action of the committee at the last meeting, it was left optional with the districts either to hold their conventions for the selection of delegates separately, or to separate at the State conventions and do their business at the same place. The Southern members of the committee objected to Senator Logan's resolutions to strike out the optional feature, saying that so many districts they had no organizations and could not hold separate meetings. It being evident that the proposition could not pass, Senator Logan withdrew it.

Washington Special:—The election of Senator Sabin as chairman gives universal satisfaction, owing to the confidence felt by all in his personal fairness and his business-like politics. He said that the honor was unexpected and unsought. He had declined, thinking it wiser to take some older member; but his colleagues believe otherwise, and he had yielded when it was known that he was the unanimous choice. He had been in favor of Blaine in 1880, but had no candidate, as yet, for 1884. He was not insensible to the compliment to himself and to Minnesota, and should do all in his power to accomplish the most good for his party, with perfect fairness to all aspirants for the presidential honor. Mr. Sabin is one of the youngest men in the senate, being but forty years of age, and is, in addition one of the new members of that body, but is already considered one of its most promising men. He has been a delegate to every national convention since he went to Minnesota, namely those of 1872, 1876 and 1880, having gone to the state in 1871. In 1872 he was in favor of Grant's nomination, and in 1876 and in 1880 favored Blaine, although obliged to cast the Minnesota vote at Chicago for Windom.

A Darkey Superstition.

At a social gathering of fashionable darkies in Memphis the other evening Mr. John Grady was fortunate enough to have eleven dollars in his pocket, and though his nickname is "Luck," was unlucky enough to lose the same through a hole in said pocket. There was no doubt that the money had fallen to the floor, and the question was which of the guests had appropriated it. By unanimous consent of the company it was decided to solve this perplexing problem by means of the infallible "sifter test," and accordingly a sifter was brought from the kitchen. To it was attached a string which was held in turn by the guests. The sifter remained motionless until the string was grasped by Oscar Jones, when it began to revolve with great rapidity. Thereupon Mr. Jones was vociferously declared to be the thief, and Mr. Grady promptly caused his arrest. Justice Quigly, who could not have been fully aware of the solemn ceremonial by which his guilt had been established, dismissed the suit.

A TERRIBLE PROPHECY.

The Red Sunsets, Cyclones and Earthquakes Foretelling Coming Disaster—How to Meet It.

The recent mysterious appearances following sunset and preceding sunrise have attracted wide attention from students of the skies and the people generally. During the days of recent weeks the sun seems to have been obscured by a thin veil of a dull leaden hue which, as the sun receded toward the horizon, became more luminous, then yellow, then orange, then red; and, as night settled down upon the earth, a dull purple. At first it was thought these appearances were ordinary sunset reflections of light but it is now pretty certain that they are either the misty substance of the tail of some unseen comet, in which the earth is enveloped, or a surrounding stratum of world dust or very small meteros. Professor Brooks, of the Red House Observatory, Phelps, N. Y., has turned his telescope upon these objects and discovered what he thinks are myriads of telescopic meteors. If it is unorganized world dust, or decomposed vapors, as the Democrat and Chronicle of Rochester, N. Y., remarks: "How is this matter to be disposed of? Will it settle and form a deposit upon the earth, or remain a partial opaque shell about the earth to cut of a portion of the sun's light upon it?"

Whatever the mystery is, there is no denying that some very strange forces are at work in the upper airs. The terrible tornadoes and cyclones which have swept our own country, and the fearful volcanoes and earthquakes which have destroyed so many cities and thousands of people—the tidal waves which mysteriously rise and fall on coasts hitherto unvexed by them—the tremendous activity which is evident in the sun by the constant revelation of enormous spots upon its surface—all indicate unusual energy in the heavenly bodies.

These circumstances recall Professor Grimmer's prophecies that from 1881 to 1887, the passage of the five great planets—Mars, Neptune, Jupiter, Uranus, and Saturn—around the sun would produce strange and wonderful phenomena. He says "The waters of the earth will become more or less poisonous. The air will be foul with noisome odors. Ancient races will disappear from the earth." He attempts to prove his prophecy by the fact that in 1720, when Mars and Saturn made their passage around the sun coincidentally, great destruction and mortality visited all parts of the globe. He also found the same results in previous perehelion passages of the planets, and argues that these circumstances always produce epidemics and destructive diseases which will baffle the skill of the most eminent physicians; that the poor will die by thousands, the weak and intemperate falling first, those whose blood has been impoverished by excess of work or dissipation next and only those who are in comparative vigor shall escape to enjoy the era of renewed activity and prosperity which will follow the period of destruction.

Inasmuch as the entire world seems subject to the sway of the heavenly bodies no part of the earth, he thinks, can escape scourging. He even predicts that America will lose over ten millions of people; that farmers will be stricken with fear and cease to till the soil; that famine will make human misery more wretched. That hundreds will flee to overcrowded cities for aid in vain. That sudden changes in ocean currents, temperature and surroundings will entirely transform the face of nature and climate of countries; that the air will be so foul with malaria and other obnoxious gases; that those who survive will be troubled with disorders of the digestive organs. That many who escape other ills will bloat with dropsy and suddenly pass away, while others will grow thin and drag out a miserable existence in indescribable agony for weeks. Neuralgic pains in different parts of the body will torment them. They will easily tire and become despondent. A faint, hot feeling will be succeeded by chilly sensations while hallucinations and dread of impending ill will paralyze all effort. "The birds in the air, the beasts of the field, and even the fish of the sea will become diseased, poisoning the air and poisoning the waters of the globe." We are told on the other hand that those who shall pass through this period of trial will have larger enjoyment of life and health. The earth will yield more abundantly than ever before. The animal kingdom will be more prolific and life prolonged very materially. This prolongation of life will be owing to the healthy electric and magnetic influences that will pervade the atmosphere. It would perhaps seem that the present redness of the sun, and the presence of a belt or veil of cosmic matter, justified, in a measure, the prediction of Professor Grimmer, but disturbing as his prediction may be we are told for our comfort that the strong and pure blooded need have little to fear in these calamities, that those who are delicate or indisposed should adopt means to keep the system well supported and the blood pure and that the most philosophical and effective method of accomplishing this is to keep the kidneys and liver in good condition. From the testimonials of such men as Dr. Dio Lewis and Professor R. A. Gunn, M. D. Dean of the United States Medical college, New York, and thousands of influential non-professional people, it seems almost certain that for this purpose there is no preparation known to science equal to Warner's Safe Cure, better known as Warner's Safe Kidney and Liver Cure. This medicine has acquired the finest reputation of any preparation that was ever put upon the market. It is a radical blood purifier, which soothes and heals all inflamed organs, strengthens the nervous system, washes out all evidences of decay, regulates digestion, prevents malassimilation of food in a philosophical and rational manner, fortifies the system against climatic changes and malarial influences and the destructive agencies which seem to be so abundant in these "evil days."

It is not our purpose to dispute the correctness of Professor Grimmer's prophecies. As we have said the marked disturbances of the past few years would seem to give a semblance of verification of his theory. It is certain, as above stated, that we are passing through what may be regarded as a crucial period and it is the part of wise men not to ignore, but to learn to fortify themselves against the possibility of being overcome by these evils. It is a duty which each man owes to himself and his fellows, to mitigate as much as possible the suffering of humanity and in no way better can he accomplish this purpose than to see to it, that he, himself, is fortified by the best known preparation in the strongest possible manner and that he exert the influence of his own example upon his fellows to the end that they too, may share with him immunity from the destructive influences which seek his ruin.

The Conductor.

Conductor Warren, of Winona, Minn., says, I used one bottle of Warner's White Wine of Tar Syrup, when I was so hoarse I could not speak above a whisper, and in twenty-four hours it cured me. It is the best remedy I ever saw.

Free to all Ministers.

I will send two bottles of Warner's White Wine of Tar free of all costs to any minister who will send us an order from his storekeeper for two dozen bottles of the same.

Mormon journal at Salt Lake, in speaking of the labors of their missionaries in the South, says: "The field is unfruitful and the climate unhealthful."

Many persons in Pittston are using Ely's Cream Balm, a Catarrh remedy, with most satisfactory results. A lady is recovering the sense of smell which she had not enjoyed for fifteen years. She had given up her case as incurable. Mr. Barber has used it in his family and commends it very highly. A Tunkhannock lawyer, known to many of our readers, testifies that he was cured of partial deafness.—Pittson (Pa.) Gazette. (Not a liquid or snuff. 50 cts.)

If Success be the true test of merit, it is a settled fact that "Brown's Bronchial Troches" have no equal for the prompt relief of Coughs, Colds, and Throat troubles. Sold only in boxes. Price 25 cts.

Mensman's Peptonized Beef Tonic, the only preparation of beef containing its entire nutritious properties. It contains blood-making, force-generating and life-sustaining properties; invaluable for Indigestion, Dyspepsia, nervous prostration, and all forms of general debility; also, in all enfeebled conditions, whether the result of exhaustion, nervous prostration, overwork, or acute disease, particularly if resulting from pulmonary complaints. CASWELL, HAZARD & CO., Proprietors, New York. Sold by Druggists.

Gen. Longstreet made a speech at Woodstock, Ill., last summer, and was visibly overcome, according to the papers, by his feelings on the new friendship of north and south. He now explains that it was simply pain caused by a bullet in his throat which he got at the battle of the Wilderness.

ALLEN'S

Lung Balsam!

A GOOD FAMILY REMEDY!

—THAT WILL CURE—

Coughs, Colds, Croup,

CONSUMPTION.

Dr. Meredith, Dentist, of Cincin'ti, was thought to be in the last stages of Consumption, and was induced by his friends to try Allen's Lung Balsam after the formula was shown him. We have his letter that it at once cured his cough and that he was able to resume his practice.

Jeremiah Wright, of Marion County, W. Va., writes us that his wife had Pulmonary Consumption and was pronounced incurable by their physician, when the use of Allen's Lung Balsam entirely cured her. He writes that he and his neighbors think it is the best medicine in the world.

Wm. C. Digges, Merchant, of Bowling Green, Va., writes April 4, 1881, that he wants us to know that the Lung Balsam has cured his mother of Consumption, after the physician had given her up as incurable. He says others knowing her case have taken the Balsam and been cured. He thinks all so afflicted should give it a trial.

Wm. A. Graham & Co., Wholesale Druggists Zanesville, Ohio, write us of the cure of Matthias Freeman, a well-known citizen, who had been afflicted with Bronchitis in its worst form for twelve years. The Lung Balsam cured him as it has cured many others of Bronchitis.

Allen's Lung Balsam

Is harmless to the most delicate child! It contains no Opium in any form!

Recommended by Physicians, Ministers and Nurses. In fact by everybody who has given it a good trial. It Never Fails to Bring Relief.

As an Expectorant it has no Equal.

TUTT'S PILLS

TORPID BOWELS, DISORDERED LIVER, and MALARIA.

From these sources arise three-fourths of the diseases of the human race. These symptoms indicate their existence: Loss of Appetite, Bowels costive, Sick Headache, fullness after eating, aversion to exertion of body or mind, Eructation of food, Irritability of temper, Low spirits, A feeling of having neglected some duty, Dizziness, Fluttering at the Heart, Dots before the eyes, highly colored Urine, CONSTIPATION, and demand the use of a remedy that acts directly on the Liver. As a Liver medicine TUTT'S PILLS have no equal. Their action on the Kidneys and Skin is also prompt; removing all impurities through these three "scavengers of the system," producing appetite, sound digestion, regular stools, a clear skin and a vigorous body. TUTT'S PILLS cause no nausea or griping nor interfere with daily work and are a perfect
